CLEOPATRA.

[We re-publish, in compliance with frequent requests, the following remarkable poem by W. W. Story—the eminent American sculptor—which appeared originally in Blackwood's Magazine. Aside from the magnificence of its diction, the idea of the poem is so bold and original that very few will feel themselves familiar with it even on a second reading. The doctrine of the Metempsychosis never had an ampler or more fitting illustration.]

HERE, Charmian, take my bracelets,
They bar with a purple stain
My arms; turn over my pillows—
They are hot where I have lain:
Open the lattice wider,
A gauze on my bosom throw,
And let me inhale the odors
That over the garden blow.

I dreamed I was with my Antony,
And in his arms I lay;
Ah, me! the vision has vanished—
Its music has died away.
The flame and the perfume have perished—
As this spiced aromatic pastille
That wound the blue smoke of its odor
Is now but an ashy hill.

Scatter upon me rose-leaves,
They cool me after my sleep,
And with sandal odors fan me
Till into my veins they creep;
Reach down the lute, and play me
A melancholy tune,
To rhyme with the dream that has vanished,
And the slumbering afternoon.

There, drowsing in golden sunlight,
Loiters the slow smooth Nile,
Through slender papyri, that cover
The sleeping crocodile.
The lotus lolls on the water,
And opens its heart of gold,
And over its broad leaf-pavement
Never a ripple rolled.
The twilight breeze is too lazy
Those feathery palms to wave,
And yon little cloud is as motionless
As a stone above a grave.

Ah me! this lifeless nature
Oppresses my heart and brain!
Oh! for a storm and thunder—
For lightning and wild fiery rain!
Fling down that lute—I hate it!
Take rather his buckler and sword,
And crash them and clash them together
Till this sleeping world is stirred.

Hark! to my Indian beauty—
My cockatoo, creamy white,
With roses under his feathers—
That flashes across the light.
Look! listen! as backward and forward
To his hoop of gold he clings,
How he trembles, with crest uplifted,
And shrieks as he madly swings!
Oh, cockatoo, shriek for Antony!
Cry, "Come, my love, come home!"
Shriek, "Antony! Antony! Antony!"
Till he hears you even in Rome.

There—leave me, and take from my chamber
That wretched little gazelle
With its bright black eyes so meaningless,
And its silly tinkling bell!
Take him—my nerves be vexes—
The thing without blood or brain—
Or, by the body of Isis,
I'll snap his thin neck in twain!

Leave me to gaze at the landscape
Mistily stretching away,
When the afternoon's opaline tremors
O'er the mountains quivering play;
Till the fiercer splendor of sunset
Pours from the west its fire,
And melted, as in a crucible,
Their earthly forms expire;
And the bald bleak skull of the desert
With glowing mountains is crowned,
That burning like molten jewels
Circle its temples round.

I will lie and dream of the past-time,
Æons of thought away,
And through the jungle of memory
Loosen my fancy to play;
When, a smooth and velvety tiger,
Ribbed with yellow and black,
Supple and cushion-footed
I wandered, where never the track
Of a human creature had rustled
The silence of mighty woods,
And, fierce in a tyrannous freedom,
I knew but the law of my moods.
The elephant, trumpeting, started
When he heard my footstep near,
And the spotted giraffes fled wildly
In a yellow cloud of fear.
I sucked in the noontide splendor,
Quivering along the glade,
Or yawning, panting, and dreaming,
Basked in the tamarisk shade,
Till I heard my wild mate roaring,
As the shadows of night came on,
To brood in the trees' thick branches
And the shadow of sleep was gone;
Then I roused, and roared in answer,
And unsheathed from my cushioned feet
My curving claws, and stretched me,
And wandered my mate to greet.
We toyed in the amber moonlight,
Upon the warm flat sand,
And struck at each other our massive arms—
How powerful he was and grand!
His yellow eyes flashed fiercely
As he crouched and gazed at me,
And his quivering tail, like a serpent,
Twitched curving nervously.
Then like a storm he seized me,
With a wild triumphant cry,
And we met as two clouds in heaven
When the thunders before them fly.
We grappled and struggled together,
For his love like his rage was rude;
And his teeth in the swelling folds of my neck
At times, in our play, drew blood.

Often another suitor—
For I was flexile and fair—
Fought for me in the moonlight,
While I lay crouched there,
Till his blood was drained by the desert;
And, ruffled with triumph and power,
He licked me and lay beside me
To breathe him a vast half-hour.
Then down to the fountain we loitered,
Where the antelopes came to drink;
Like a bolt we sprang upon them,
Ere they had time to shrink.
We drank their blood and crushed them,
And tore them limb from limb,
And the hungriest lion doubted
Ere he disputed with him.

That was a life to live for!
Not this weak human life,
With its frivolous bloodless passions,
Its poor and petty strife!
Come to my arms, my hero,
The shadows of twilight grow.
And the tiger's ancient fierceness
In my veins begins to flow.
Come not cringing to sue me!
Take me with triumph and power,
As a warrior that storms a fortress!
I will not shrink or cower.
Come, as you came in the desert,
Ere we were women and men,
When the tiger passions were in us,
And love as you loved me then?

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, an only son and spendthrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and forty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amberst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post-mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London. In London, at the house of Stewart Routh, a gentlemanly gambler and adventurer of good accomplishments and address, the reader is introduced to his wife Harriet, commonly addressed by Routh as "Harry,"—a woman of rare mental qualifications and quick appreciation, thoroughly devoted to her husband, his counselor in all his schemes, and a most efficient aid in his precarious mode of living.

One Deane, an American, a cool, sharp, "posted" man, with abundant means, is also introduced, whose cleverness is even too much for the designs of Routh and his wife. George Dallas receives a letter from his mother, who writes him that the one hundred and forty pounds, obtained by a great risk and almost criminal sacrifice, will be given to him by her in person at Amberst. He informs Routh of the import of his mother's letter. Routh, meanwhile, is organizing a company for working some newly discovered silver mines in Brazil, which promises to be "a big thing," but is badly in want of funds to successfully launch his scheme; when he learns from Deane that he is to receive for some stock transaction three thousand pounds, which sum Deane proposes to keep in his desk for a few days until wanted; and, in celebration of the event, he invites Routh and Dallas to dine with him at a fashionable restaurant on the same evening. Routh tells his wife that he must have Deane's money "one way or another." The dinner comes off, but Routh is not present.

George Dallas again visits Amherst under his author-name of "Paul Ward," to receive from his mother the money she promised him; when he learns from her lips that she has secretly sent her diamonds to Paris to be imitated, with the object of pledging the genuine ones as the only available means of obtaining the amount. The jewelry failing to arrive, his mother requests him to stop at Amherst for a few days to await its arrival. While sketching a private park, "The Sycamores," a chance acquaintance is brought about—which rapidly ripens into mutual though unavowed feelings of affection between Miss Clare Carruthers, a beautiful young lady of nineteen, the favorite niece and heir of the rich Capel Carruthers—Dallas' father-in-law—and our hero; known only to Miss Carruthers as "Paul Ward," the author.

AMONG THE BEECHES.

"HOW beautiful she is, how frank, how graceful, how unspeakably innocent and refined! She spoke to me with such an utter absence of conventional pretence, without a notion that she might possibly be wrong in speaking to a stranger, who had offered her a civility in her uncle's park. She told that man on the balcony that night that Sir Thomas Boldero was her uncle. I did not remember it when the old man mentioned the name. How long has she been here, I wonder? Is she as much here as at Poynings? How surprised she would be if she knew that I know who she is; that I have heard her voice before to-day; that in the pocket-book she held in her hand a few minutes ago there lies a withered flower which she once touched and wore. Good God! What would a girl like that think of me, if she knew what I am—if she knew that I stole like a thief to the window of my mother's house, and looked in, shivering, a poverty-stricken wretch, come there to ask for alms, while she herself glittered among my mother's company, like the star of beauty and youth she is? How could she but despise me if she knew it! But she will never know it, or me, most likely. I shall try to get away and work out all this, far away in a country where no memories of sin and shame and sorrow will rise up around me like ghosts. I am glad to have seen and spoken to Clare Carruthers; it must do me good to remember that such a woman really exists, and is no poet's or romancer's dream. I am glad to think of her as my mother's friend, companion, daughter almost. My mother, who never had a daughter, and has, God help her, no son but me! But I shall never see her again, mostly likely. When I reach the house, I shall find a pompous servant, no doubt, charged with Sir Thomas' compliments, and orders to show me round a gallery of spurious Dutch pictures, copies of Raphael and Carlo Dolce, and a lot of languishing Lelys and gluttony-suggesting Kneller's."

With these disparaging words in his thoughts, George Dallas reached the border of the park, and found himself in front of the house. The facade was even more imposing and beautiful than he had been led to expect by the distant view of it, and the wide arched doorway gave admittance to an extensive quadrangle beyond. A stone terrace stretched away at either side of the entrance, as at Poynings. Standing on the lower step, a tame peacock displaying his gaudy plumage by her side, he saw Miss Carruthers. She came forward to meet him with a heightened color and embarrassed manner, and said:

"I am very sorry, indeed, but Sir Thomas and my aunt are not at home. They had no intention of leaving home when I went out for my ride, but they have been gone for some time." She looked towards a servant who stood near, and added: "I am so sorry; nothing would have given my uncle more pleasure; but if you will allow me, I will send—"

George interrupted her, but with perfect politeness.

"Thank you very much, but, if you will allow me, I will take my leave, and hope to profit by Sir Thomas Boldero's kindness on a future occasion." He bowed deeply, and was turning away, when, seeing that she looked really distressed, he hesitated.

"I will show you the pictures myself, if you will come with me," she said, in a tone so frank, so kindly and engaging, that the sternest critic of manners in existence, supposing that critic to have been any other than an old maid, could not have condemned the spontaneous courtesy as forwardness. "I am an indifferent substitute for my uncle, as a cicerone, but I think I know the names of all the artists, and where all the pictures came from." Stephen," she spoke now to the servant, "I am going to take this gentleman through the picture-gallery; go on before us if you please."

So George Dallas and Clare Carruthers entered the house together, and lingered over the old carvings in the hall, over their inspection of the sporting pictures which adorned it, and the dining room, over the family portraits in the vestibule, the old china vases, and the rococo furniture. Every subject had an interest for them, and they did not think of asking themselves in what that interest originated and consisted. The girl did not know the young man's name, but his voice was full of the charm of sweet music for her, and in his face her fancy read strange and beautiful things. He was an artist, she knew already, which in sober language meant that she had seen a very tolerable sketch which he had made. He was a poet, she felt quite convinced; for did he not quote Tennyson, and Keats, and Coleridge, and Herrick and Herbert, as they wandered among the really fine and valuable paintings which formed Sir Thomas Boldero's collection, so aptly and with such deep feeling and appreciation as could spring only from a poetic soul?

It was the old story, which has never been truly told, which shall never cease in the telling. Both were young, and one was beautiful; and though the present is an age which mocks at love at first sight, and indeed regards love at all, under any circumstances, with only decent toleration, not by any means amounting to favor, it actually witnesses it sometimes. The young man and the girl—the idle, dissolute, perverted young man, the beautiful, pure, innocent, proud, pious young girl—talked together that spring afternoon, as the hours wore on to evening, of art, of literature, of music, of travel, of the countless things over which their fancy rambled, and which had wondrous charms for her bright intellect and her secluded life, simple and ignorant in the midst of its luxury and refinement. All that was best and noblest in George's mind came out at the gentle bidding of the voice that sounded for him with a new, undreamed-of music; and the hard, cold, wicked world in which he lived, in which hitherto, with rare intervals of better impulses, he had taken delight, fell away from him, and was forgotten.

The girl's grace and beauty, refinement and gentleness, were not more conspicuous than her bright intelligence and taste, cultivated, not indeed by travel or society, but by extensive and varied reading. Such was the influence which minute after minute was gaining upon George. And for her? Her fancy was busily at work too. She loved art; it filled her with wonder and reverence. Here was an artist, a young, handsome artist, of unexceptionable manners. She adored poetry, regarding it as a divine gift; and here was a poet—yes, a poet; for she had made Dallas confess that he very often wrote "verses;" but that was his modesty; she knew he wrote poetry—beautiful poetry. Would he ever let her see any of it?

"Yes, certainly," he had answered; "when I am famous, and there is a brisk competition for me among the publishers, I will send a copy of my poems to you."

"To me! But you do not know my name."

"O yes I do. You are Miss Carruthers."

"I am; but who told you?"

The question disconcerted Dallas a little. He turned it off by saying, "Why, how can you suppose I could be at Amherst without learning that the niece of Sir Thomas Boldero, of the Sycamores, is Miss Carruthers?"

"Ah, true; I did not think of that," said Clare, simply.—"But I do not live here generally; I live with another uncle, my father's brother—Sir Thomas is my mother's—Mr. Capel Carruthers, at Poynings, seven miles from here. Have you heard of Poynings?"

Yes, Mr. Dallas had heard of Poynings; but now he must take his leave. It had long been too dark to look at the pictures, and the young people were standing in the great hall, near the open door, whence they could see the gate and the archway, and a cluster of servants idling about and looking out for the return of the carriage. Clare was suddenly awakened to a remembrance of the lateness of the hour, and at once received her visitor's farewell, gracefully reiterating her assurances that her uncle would gladly make him free of the park for sketching purposes. She would tell Sir Thomas of the pleasant occurrences of the day; by the by, she had not the pleasure of knowing by what name she should mention him to her uncle.

"A very insignificant one, Miss Carruthers. My name is Paul Ward."

And so he left her, and, going slowly down the great avenue among the beeches, met a carriage containing a comely, good-humored lady and an old gentleman, also comely and good-humored; who both bowed and smiled graciously as he lifted his hat to them.

"Sir Thomas and my lady, of course," thought George; "a much nicer class of relatives than Capel Carruthers, I should say."

He walked briskly towards the town. While he was in Clare's company he had forgotten how hungry he was, but now the remembrance returned with full vigor, and he remembered very clearly how many hours had elapsed since he had eaten. When he came in sight of the railway station, a train was in the act of coming in from London. As he struck into a little by-path leading to the inn, the passengers got out of the carriages, passed through the station gate and began to struggle up in the same direction. He and they met where the by-path joined the road, and he reached the inn in the company of three of the passengers, who were about to remain at Amherst. Mr. Page was in the hall, and asked George if he would dine.

"Dine?" said George. Certainly. Give me anything you like, so that you don't keep me waiting; that's the chief thing."

"It is late, sir, indeed," remarked Mr. Page; "half past seven, sir."

"So late?" said George, carelessly, as he turned into the coffee-room.

CHAPTER VIII.

GLAMOUR.

When George Dallas had dined, he left the coffee-room, and retired to the bedroom which he had ordered, and over a "bit of fire" he sat long, his arms folded on his breast, his head bent, his brow lowering, his eyes fixed on the glowing embers. Was he looking at faces in the fire—his parents' faces, the faces of friends, whom he had treated as enemies, of enemies whom he had taken for friends? Were reproachful eyes looking at him from out the past; were threatening glances in the present upon him? He sat there, black and moody, a long while, but at length his fixed gaze relaxed, the muscles of his mouth softened, broke into a slow smile, and a light came into his dull, gloomy eyes. Then he rose, took his pocket-book from his breast-pocket, made some memoranda at the back of the sketch taken that day in Sir Thomas Boldero's park, put back the book, and, once more settling himself near the fire, lighted his pipe and began to smoke.

The musing look remained upon his face, but it was no longer painful, and, as he smoked, he fell to building castles in the air, as baseless, maybe, as the vapour which curled in fantastic wreaths about his face, but tenanted by hope, and inspired by higher and better resolves than had animated George Dallas for many a day. The twin angels, love and gratitude, were near him; invisibly their soft white wings were fluttering about him, refreshing the jaded heart and the stained brow. His mother, and the girl whom he had that day seen for the second time, and recognized with feelings full of a bitter and evil impulse at first, but who had soon exercised over him a nameless fascination full of a pure and thrilling delight, such as no pleasure of all his sin-stained life had ever previously brought him; of these two he was thinking. If George Dallas could have seen his mother at the moment, when he, having laid his exhausted pipe upon the little wooden chimneypiece, and hastily undressed, lay down in his bed, with his hands clasped over the top of his head, in his favorite attitude when he had anything particular to think of, he would have found her not only thinking but talking of him with her trusty friend Mrs. Brookes.

There was no reticence on this occasion; the mother had taken a dangerous step, and one whose necessity she indeed deeply deplored, but she had gotten over the first great effort and the apprehension connected with it, and now she thought only of her son, she dwelt only upon the hope, the confidence, the instinctive belief within her, that this was really the turning point, that her prayers had been heard, that the rock of a hard and stubborn heart had been struck and had yielded, that her son would turn from the old evil paths, would consider his ways and be wise for the future. So she sat and talked to the humble friend who knew her and loved her better than any one else in the world knew or loved her, and when she at length dismissed her and lay down to rest there was more peace at her heart than had dwelt there for a long time past.

So one of whom the prodigal son had thought gently and gratefully that night, was thinking of him with love that no unworthiness could kill or lessen, with hope which no experience could exhaust. And the other? Well, the other was playing and singing to her uncle and aunt in the green drawing-room at the Sycamores, and if she had said little to Sir Thomas and Lady Boldero concerning the young artist who was so delighted with the picture-gallery, and who had despaired of doing justice to the grand old trees in the park, it is presumable that, like the parrot of old renown, she thought the more.

George Dallas slept well, and in the morning went out, and once more took the direction of the Sycamores.

The day was bright and cheerful, and a light breeze was stirring the budding branches and lending a sense of exhilaration to the young man who so rarely looked on the fair face of nature, and who had unhappily had all his purer tastes and sympathies so early deadened. They revived under the influence of the scene and the softening effect of the adventure which had befallen him the day before. He stopped opposite the oaken gates, which had lain open yesterday, but were closed to-day, and he rambled on, further away from the town, and crossing the road, took his way along the park paling, where the fragrant odor from the shrubberies added a fresh pleasure to his walk.

He had passed a bend of the road which swept away from the large gates of the park, and was peering in at the mossy tufts, studded with violets and bluebells clustering round the stems of the young trees in the plantation, when his eyes lighted on a small gate, a kind of wicket in the paling, imperfectly secured by a very loose latch, and from which a straight narrow path, bordered with trimly-kept rows of ground ivy, led into a broader road dividing the plantation from the park.

"A side entrance, of course," said Dallas to himself, and then, looking across the road, he saw that just opposite the little gate there was a wooden stile, by which a path through the fields, leading, no doubt, into the town of Amherst, could be attained from the raised footpath.

"I suppose the land on both sides belongs to Sir Thomas," thought Dallas, and as he made a momentary pause, a large black Newfoundland dog, carrying a basket in his mouth, came down the narrow path, bumped himself against the loosely fastened gate, swung it open, and stopped in the aperture, with a droll air of having done something particularly clever. Dallas looked admiringly at the beautiful animal, and the next instant he heard a voice speaking from the top of the straight walk.

"Here, 'Cæsar,'" it said; "come here, sir; who told you I was going that way?"

"Cæsar" tossed up his head, somewhat to the detriment of the basket, and lolloped about with his big black legs, but did not retrace his steps, and the next moment Miss Carruthers appeared. A few yards only divided her from George, who stood outside the gate, his face turned full towards her as she came down the path, and who promptly took off his hat. She returned his salutation with embarrassment, but with undisguisable pleasure, and blushed most becomingly.

"I suppose I ought to walk on and leave her; but I won't," said George to himself, in the momentary silence which followed their mutual salutation, and then, in a kind of desperation, he said:

"I am fortunate to meet you again, by a lucky accident, Miss Carruthers. You are out earlier to-day, and this is "Cæsar's" turn."

He patted the shiny black head of the Newfoundland, who still obstructed the entrance to the path, as he spoke, and "Cæsar" received the attention tolerably graciously.

"Yes, I generally walk early, and ride in the afternoon."

"Escorted by your dumb friends only," said George, in a tone not quite of interrogation. Miss Carruthers blushed again, as she replied:

"Yes, my horse and my dog are my companions generally. My aunt never walks, and Sir Thomas never rides. Were you going into the park again, Mr. Ward?"

By this time "Cæsar" had run out into the road, and was in a state of impatient perplexity, and evidently much inconvenienced by the basket, which he was too well trained to drop, but shook disconsolately as he glanced reproachfully at Clare, wondering how much longer she meant to keep him waiting.

"No, Miss Carruthers, I was merely walking past the Sycamores, and recalling yesterday's pleasure—half gladly, half sadly, as I fancy we recall all pleasures."

"I—I told my uncle of your visit yesterday, and he said he was sorry to have missed you, and hoped you would see as much of the park as you liked. Did—did you finish your sketch, Mr. Ward? Oh, that horrid 'Cæsar,' he will have the handle off my basket. Just see how he is knocking it against the stile."

She came hurriedly through the open gateway into the road, George following her.

"May I take it from him?" he said.

"Oh, pray do; there now, he is over the stile, and running through the field."

George rushed away in pursuit of "Cæsar," triumphant in his success in thus terminating a period of inaction for which he saw no reasonable excuse. Miss Carruthers mounted the stile in a more leisurely fashion, turned into the footpath which led through the field, and in a few moments met George returning, her basket in his hand, and "Cæsar" slouching along beside him, sulky and discontented.

She thanked George, told him she was going nearly as far as Amherst by the "short cut," which lay through her uncle's land, and the two young people in another minute found themselves walking side by side, as if such an arrangement were quite a matter of course, to which Mrs. Grundy could not possibly make any objection. Of course, it was highly imprudent, not to say improper, and one of the two was perfectly conscious alike of the imprudence and the impropriety: perfectly conscious, also, that both were increased by the fact that he was George Dallas, and the young lady was Clare Carruthers, the niece of his stepfather, the girl, mainly, on whose account he had been shut out from the house called by courtesy his mother's. As for Clare Carruthers, she knew little or nothing of life and the world of observances and rules of behavior. Sheltered from the touch, from the breath, from the very knowledge of ill, the girl had always been free with a frank innocent freedom, happy with a guileless happiness, and as unsophisticated as any girl could well be in this wide-awake realistic nineteenth century. She was highly imaginative, emphatically of the romantic temperament, and, in short, a Lydia Languish without the caricature. Her notions of literary men, artists, and the like, were derived from their works; and as the little glimpse which she had as yet had of society (she had only "come out" at the ball at Poynings in February) had not enabled her to correct her ideas by comparison with reality, she cherished her illusions with ardor proportioned to their fallaciousness. The young men of her acquaintance were of either two species: sons of country gentlemen, with means and inclination to devote themselves to the kind of life their fathers led, or military magnificoes, of whom Clare, contrary to the fashion of young ladies in general, entertained a mean and contemptuous opinion. When Captain Marsh and Captain Clitheroe were home "on leave," they found it convenient and agreeable to pass a good deal of their leisure at Poynings; and as they happened to be ninnies of the first magnitude, whose insignificance in every sense worth mention was only equalled by their conceit, Miss Carruthers had conceived a prejudice against military men in general founded upon her dislike of the two specimens with whom she was most familiar. So Clare's imagination had no home pasture in which to feed, and roamed far afield.

It had taken its hue from her tastes, which were strongly pronounced in the direction of literature. Clare had received a "good education;" that is to say, she had been placed by a fashionable mother under the care of a fashionable governess, who had superintended fashionable masters while they imparted a knowledge of music, drawing, dancing, and a couple of modern languages to her pretty docile, intelligent pupil. The more solid branches of instruction Clare had climbed under Miss Pettigrew's personal care, and had "done credit" to her instructress, as the phrase goes. But the upshot of it all was, that she had very little sound knowledge, and that the real educational process had commenced for her with the termination of Miss Pettigrew's reign, and had received considerable impetus when Clare had been transferred—on the not particularly lamented decease of the fashionable mother, who was Sir Thomas Boldero's sister, and remarkably unlike that hearty and unworldly country gentleman—to Poynings and the guardianship of Mr. Carruthers. Then the girl began to read after her own fancy indeed, unguided and uncontrolled, but in an omnivorous fashion; and as she was full of feeling, fancy, and enthusiasm, her reading ran a good deal in the poetical, romantic, and imaginative line. Novels she devoured, and she was of course a devotee of Tennyson and Longfellow, saying of the latter, as her highest idea of praise, that she could hardly believe him to be an American, or a dweller in that odious vulgar country, and wondering why Mrs. Carruthers seemed a little annoyed by the observation. She read history, too, provided it was picturesquely written, and books of travel, exploration, and adventure she delighted in. Periodical literature she was specially addicted to, and it was rather a pleasant little vanity of Clare to "keep up with" all the serial stories—not confusing the characters or the incidents, no matter how numerous they were.

She had so much access to books that, as far as a lady's possible requirements could go, it might be said, without exaggeration, to be unlimited. Not only did the Sycamores boast a fine library, kept with the utmost care and attention by Sir Thomas Boldero, and of which she had the freedom, but Poynings was also very respectably endowed in a similar respect. She was so surrounded with luxury and comfort, that it was not wonderful she should invest opposite conditions of existence with irresistible charms, and her habitual associates were so commonplace, so prosperous and conventional, that her aspirations for opportunities of hero-worship naturally directed themselves towards oppressed worth, unappreciated genius, and fiery hearts struggling manfully with adverse fate. "The red planet Mars" was a great favorite with her, and to suffer and be strong a much finer idea to her mind than not to suffer and to have no particular occasion for strength. Mrs. Grundy would doubtless have had a great deal to say, and a very fair pretext for saying it, had she seen Miss Carruthers strolling through the fields which lay between the Sycamores and Amherst, in deep and undisguisedly delighted conversation with a strange young man, who was apparently absorbed in the pleasure of talking to and listening to her, while "Cæsar" trotted now by the side of the one, anon of the other, with serene and friendly complacency. Mrs. Grundy was, however, not destined to know anything about the "very suspicious" circumstance for the present. And George Dallas and Clare Carruthers, with the unscrupulous yielding to the impulse of the moment, which affords youth such splendid opportunities for getting into scrapes, from which the utmost efforts of their elders are powerless to extract them, walked and talked and improved the shining hours into a familiar acquaintance, which the girl would have called friendship, but which the young man felt, only too surely, was love at first sight. He had mocked at such an idea, had denied its existence, had derided it with tongue and pen, but here it was, facing him now, delivering to him a silent challenge to deny, dispute, or mock at it any more.

A faint suspicion that the beautiful girl whom he had seen yesterday for the second time meant something in his life, which no woman had ever meant before, had hung about him since he had left the Sycamores after their first interview; but now, as he walked beside her, he felt that he had entered the enchanted land, that he had passed away from old things, and that the chain of his old life had fallen from him. For weal or woe, present with her or absent from her, he knew he loved this girl, the one girl whom it was absolutely forbidden to him to love.

They had talked commonplaces at first, though each was conscious that the flurried earnestness of the other's manner was an absurd commentary upon the ordinary style of their conversation. George had asked, and Clare had implied, no permission for him to accompany her on her walk; he had quietly taken it for granted, and she had as quietly acquiesced, and it so happened that they did not meet a single person to stare at the tall, gaunt-looking, but handsome stranger walking with Miss Carruthers, to wonder who he "mought a bin," and proceed to impart his curiosity to the servants at the Sycamores, or the gossip at the ale-house.

"This path is not much used," said George.

"No, very little indeed," replied Clare. "You see it does not lead directly anywhere but to the Sycamores, and so the farming people, my uncle's servants, and tradespeople, back and forward to the park, chiefly use it. I often come this way, and do not meet a soul."

"Are you going into the town?"

"Not all the way: just to the turnpike on the Poynings road. Do you know Mr. Carruthers' place, Mr. Ward?"

George felt rather uncomfortable as he answered in the negative, though it was such a small matter, and the false statement did not harm anybody. He had told a tolerable number of lies in the course of his life, but he shrank with keen and unaccustomed pain from making this girl, whose golden brown eyes looked at him so frankly, whose sweet face beamed on him so innocently, a false answer.

"I am going to the cottage on the roadside just below the turnpike," Clare continued; "an old servant of my aunt lives there, and I have a message from her. I often go to see her, not so much for kindness, I'm afraid, as because I hate to walk outside the park without an object."

"And you don't mind riding without an escort any more than you do walking without one," said George, not in the tone of a question, but in that of a simple remark. Clare looked at him with some surprise; he met the look with a meaning smile.

"You dislike the attendance of a groom. Miss Carruthers, and never admit it except in case of necessity. You are surprised, I see; you will be still more surprised when I tell you I learned this, not from seeing you ride alone in the park—there is nothing unusual in that, especially when you are on such good terms with your horse—but from your own lips."

"From my own lips, what can you possibly mean, Mr. Ward? I never saw you until yesterday, and I know I never mentioned the subject then."

The young man drew imperceptibly nearer to her, on the narrow path where they were walking, and as he spoke the following sentences, he took from his breast pocket a little note case, which he held in his left hand, at which she glanced curiously once or twice.

"You saw me, for the first time yesterday, Miss Carruthers, but I had seen you before. I had seen you the centre of a brilliant society, the pride and belle of a ball-room where I had no place."

("Now," thought George, "if she only goes home and tells my mother all this, it will be a nice business. Never mind, I can't help it," and he went on impetuously.) The girl made no remark, but she looked at him with growing astonishment. "You talked to a gentleman happier than I—for he was with you—of your daily rides, and I heard all you said. Forgive me, the first tone of your voice told me it was but a light and trival conversation, or I would not have listened to it." (George is not certain that he is telling the truth here, but she is convinced of it; for is he not an author, an artist, a hero?) "I even heard the gentleman's name with whom you were talking, and just before you passed out of my hearing you unconsciously gave me this."

He opened the note-book, took out a folded slip of paper, opened that, too, and held towards Clare, but without giving it into her hand, a slip of myrtle.

"I gave you that, Mr. Ward!" she exclaimed. "I—when—where—how? What do you mean? I remember no such conversation as you describe; I don't remember anything about a ball or a piece of myrtle. When and where was it? I have been out so little in London."

Now George had said nothing about London, but opportunely remembering that he could not explain the circumstances he had rather rashly mentioned, and that, unexplained, they might lead her to the conclusion that the part he had played on the mysterious occasion in question had been that of a burglar, he adroitly availed himself of her error. True, on the other hand, she might very possibly think that the only part which a spectator at a ball in London, who was not a partaker in its festivities, could have played must have been that of a waiter, which was not a pleasant suggestion; but somehow he felt no apprehension on that score. The girl went on eagerly questioning him, but he only smiled, very sweetly and slowly, as he carefully replaced the withered twig in the note-book, and the note-book in his pocket.

"I cannot answer your questions, Miss Carruthers; this is my secret—a cherished one, I assure you. The time may come, though the probability is very dim and distant just now, when I shall tell you when, and where, and how I saw you first; and if ever that time should come," he stopped, cleared his voice, and went on, "things will be so different with me that I shall have nothing to be ashamed or afraid of."

"Ashamed of, Mr. Ward?" said Clare, in a sweet soft tone of deprecating wonder. All her curiosity had been banished by the trouble and sadness of his manner, and profound interest and sympathy had taken its place.

"You think I ought not to use that word; I thank you for the gentle judgment," said George, his manner indescribably softened and deepened; "but if ever I am in a position to tell—but why do I talk such nonsense? I am only a waif, a stray, thrown for a moment in your path, to be swept from it the next and forgotten."

This was dangerous ground, and they both felt it. A chance meeting, a brief association which perhaps never ought to have been; and here was this girl, well brought up, in the strictest sense of the term, yielding to the dangerous charm of the stranger's society, and feeling her heart die within her as his words showed the prospect before her. Her complexion died too, for Clare's was a tell-tale face, on which emotion had irresistible power. George saw the sudden paleness, and she knew he saw it.

"I—I hope not," she said, rather incoherently. "I—I think not. You are an artist and an author, you know." (How ashamed George felt, how abashed in the presence of this self-deluding innocence of hers!) "And I, as well as all the world, shall hear of you."

"You, as well as all the world," he repeated, in a dreamy tone. "Well, perhaps so. I will try to think so, and to hope it will be——"

He stopped; the gentleman's nature in him still existing, still ready at call, notwithstanding his degradation, withheld him from presuming on the position in which he found himself, and in which the girl's innocent impressiveness had placed her. To him, with his knowledge of who she was, and who he was, the sort of intimacy which had sprung up, had not so much strangeness as it externally exhibited, and he had to remind himself that she did not share that knowledge, and therefore stood on a different level to his, in the matter. He determined to get off the dangerous ground, and there was a convincing proof in that determination that the tide had turned for the young man, that he had indeed resolved upon the better way. His revenge upon his step-father lay ready to his hand; the unconscious girl made it plain to him that he had excited a strange and strong interest in her. It was not a bad imitation of the prodigal's project of reform that he renounced that revenge, and turned away from the temptation to improve his chance advantage into the establishment of an avowed mutual interest. This step he took by saying, gaily, "Then I have your permission to send you my first work, Miss Carruthers, and you promise it a place in that grand old library which I had a glimpse of yesterday?"

A little shade of something like disappointment crossed Clare's sunny face. The sudden transition in his tone jarred with her feelings of curiosity, romance, and flattered vanity. For Clare had her meed of that quality, like other women and men, and had never had it so pleasantly gratified as on the present occasion. But she had too much good breeding to be pertinacious on any subject, and too much delicacy of perception to fail in taking the hint which the alteration in George's manner conveyed. So there was no further allusion to the sprig of myrtle or to the future probability of a disclosure; but the two walked on together, and talked of books, pictures, and the toils and triumphs of a literary life (George, to do him justice, not affecting a larger share in them than was really his), until they neared Miss Carruthers' destination. The footpath which they had followed had led them by a gentle rise in the ground to the brow of a little hill, similar to that from which George had seen his mother's carriage approach Amherst on the preceding day, but from the opposite end of the town. Immediately under the brow of this hill, and approached by the path, which inclined towards its trim green gate, stood a neat small cottage, in a square bit of garden, turning its red brick, vine-covered side to the road beneath. When George saw this little dwelling, he knew his brief spell of enjoyment was over.

"That is the cottage," said Clare, and he had the consolation of observing that there was no particular elation in her voice or in her face. "Sir Thomas built it for its present tenant."

"Shall you be going back to the Sycamores alone, Miss Carruthers?" asked George, in the most utterly irrelevant manner. He had a wild notion of asking leave to wait for her, and escort her home. Again Clare blushed as she replied hurriedly:

"No, I shall not. My aunt is to pick me up here in the carriage, on her way to the town, and I return to Poynings this evening. I have been away a fortnight."

George longed to question her concerning life at Poynings, longed to mention his mother's name, or to say something to the girl that would lead her to mention it; but the risk was too great, and he refrained.

"Indeed! and when do you return to the Sycamores?" was all he said.

"It is quite uncertain," she replied. "I fancy my uncle means to go to London for part of the season, but we don't quite know yet; he never says much about his plans." She stopped abruptly, as if conscious she was not conveying a very pleasing impression of her uncle. George understood her, and correctly, to refer to Mr. Carruthers.

The had descended the incline by this time, and were close to the cottage gate. It lay open, and Cæsar ran up to the prim little green door.

"Come here, sir," called Clare; "please let him have the basket again, Mr. Ward. Old Willcox reared him for me, from a puppy, and he likes to see him at his tricks. Thank you. Now then, go on, Cæsar."

Her hand was on the open gate, her face turned away from the cottage, towards George—it was no easier to her to say good-by than to him, he thought; but it must be said, so he began to say it,

"Then, Miss Carruthers, here I must leave you; and soon I must leave Amherst."

Perhaps he hoped she would repeat the invitation of yesterday. She did not; she only said:

"Thank you very much for your escort, Mr. Ward. Good-by."

It was the coldest, most constrained of adieux. He felt it so, and yet he was not altogether dissatisfied; he would have been more so, had she restrained the natural grace of her manner and the sweet gaiety of her tone. He would have given much to touch her hand in parting, but she did not offer it; but with a bow passed up the little walk to the cottage door, and in a moment the door had closed upon her, and she was lost to his sight.

He lingered upon the high road from which he could see the cottage, and gazed at the window, in the hope of catching another glimpse of Clare; but suddenly remembering that she might perhaps see him from the interior of the room, and be offended by his doing so, he walked briskly away in a frame of mind hard to describe, and with feelings of a conflicting character. Above the tumult of new-born love, of pride, rage, mortification, anger, hope, the trust of youth in itself, and dawning resolutions of good, there was this thought, clear and prominent:

"If I am ever to see her again, it shall be in my own character, and by no tricky subterfuge. If she ever comes to care for me, she shall not be ashamed of me."

George Dallas returned to the inn, where his taciturnity and pre-occupation did not escape notice by the waiters and Mr. Page, who accounted for it by commenting on his request for writing materials, to the use of which he addressed himself in his own room, as a "hoddity of them literary geuts'; if they ain't blabby and blazin' drunk, they're most times uncommon sullen. This un's a poctical chap, I take it."

That evening George heard from his mother. She desired him to come to Poyniugs at 12 o'clock on the following Monday (this was Saturday), and to wait in the shrubbery on the left of the house until she should join him. The note was brief, but affectionate, and of course made George understand that she had received the jewels.

The result of the German war has been the disappointment of Napoleon. He thought that Austria would conquer, and that Prussia on her knees would beg his mediation, and in return for it give him the Rhine provinces. How greatly miscalculated the world now sees, and its bitter comments must be most galling to a prince who heretofore was proud to be considered the arbiter of Europe, but who now is compelled to yield to Prussian dictation of affairs not only in Germany, but to some extent upon his own borders.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

DID BACON WRITE SHAKSPEARE?*

IT is not probable that the question as to the authorship of "Shakspeare's plays" will ever be settled beyond controversy, or even so settled as to leave no room for reasonable doubt: and we suspect that in the majority of cases it will be found that those who treat the hypothesis that William Shakspeare, of Stratford on Avon, may not have been their real author as too absurd for discussion, have not made themselves familiar with the arguments by which that hypothesis is maintained. To say the least, the considerations urged in favor of the theory that Bacon was the real author of the plays, do not seem, when fully stated, so destitute of force as to warrant us in treating them with contempt. Nowhere has the argument in support of this theory been so fully set forth, as in a recent volume entitled The Authorship of Shakspeare, by Mr. Nathaniel Holmes, a St. Louis lawyer, who is said to have devoted the leisure of many years to the examination of the subject in all its aspects. The views resulting from this protracted investigation, together with the facts and reasonings upon which they are founded, are now presented to the public in a book of some six hundred pages, which of course will find but few careful readers outside of a small circle of critics and Shakspearean students.

The following brief resumé of the argument, made by the author himself, may serve to furnish some idea of the general nature of the proofs relied on:

"All that gives peculiarity and pre-eminence to these plays is to be found in Bacon; vast comprehension, the profoundest philosophic depth, the subtle discrimination of differences and resemblances, matured wisdom, vigor and splendor of imagination, accurate observation of nature, extensive knowledge of men and manners, the mighty genius, the boundless wit, the brevity of expression and pregnant weight of matter, a fine æsthetic appreciation of the beautiful, the classical scholarship, familiarity with law, courts, and legal proceedings, with the metaphysic of jurisprudence, with statesmen and princes, ladies and courtiers, and that proper sense which belonged to the age, of the dignity, sovereign duties, power and honor of the throne and King, the sovereign power in the State; all this, and more than can be named, belongs to both writings, and therefore to one author. Here was a man that could be a Shakspeare. Coleridge, Schlegel, Goethe, Jean Paul Richter, Carlyle, Emerson, Delia, Bacon, Gervinus, and, doubtless, many more, clearly saw that the real Shakspeare must have been such a man, in spite of all the biographies. 'Ask your own hearts,' says Coleridge, 'ask your own common sense, to conceive the possibility of this man being the anomalous, the wild, the irregular genius of our daily criticism! What! are we to have miracles in sport? Or, I speak reverently, does God choose idiots by whom to convey divine truths to man?' And yet, even Coleridge failed to discover, that 'the morning star, the guide, the pioneer of true philosophy, was not William Shakspeare, but Francis Bacon.

"The last and most conclusive proof of all is that general, inwrought, and all-pervading identity, which is to be found in these writings, when carefully studied, and which, when it is looked for and seen, is appreciated and convinces, like the character of a handwriting by an indescribable genuineness and an irresistible force of evidence. In the words of A. W. Schlegel, speaking of Shakspeare: 'On all the stamp of his mighty spirit is impressed.' The distinguishing qualities of Bacon's prose style are precisely those which belong to the poet, namely: Breadth of thought, depth of insight, weight of matter, brevity, force, and beauty of expression, brilliant metaphor, using all nature as a symbol of thought, and that supreme power of imagination that is necessary to make him an artistic creator, adding man to the universe; qualities, which mark that mind only which God hath framed 'as a mirror or glass, capable of the image of the universal world.' His speeches display these qualities. The oratorical style of that day seems to have been more close and weighty than in our times; it was full of strength and earnestness. Lord Coke spoke in thunderbolts, huge, Cyclopean, tremendous; he went to the very pith and heart of the matter, at once, and his speech was always multum in parvo. But in him, it was vigor without grace, power without splendor or beauty, and ability unillumined by the divine light of genius. When we know that Bacon had been such a poet, it ceases to be a wonder that he was such an orator as he was. The mind that had been conceiving dramatic speeches, at this rate, during a period of thirty years or more, could never address a court, a parliament, or a King, otherwise than in the language, style, and imagery of poetry. In short, Bacon's prose is Shakspearean poetry, and Shakspeare's poetry is Baconian prose."

It is said that Mr. Holmes' attention was first drawn to the subject of the present volume by an article in Putnam's Magazine, by Miss Delia Bacon, published many years ago. Miss Bacon not only maintained that the plays were written by Lord Bacon, but, also, that they had an esoteric political significance, to which she afterwards undertook to furnish a key in a bulky volume, the title of which we cannot at this moment recall. Becoming interested in the subject, Mr. Holmes commenced the investigations which resulted in the present volume.

A HIT AT TOURIST BOWLES.

The London Saturday Review, for October 6th, in a notice of Mr. Bowles' Across the Continent, delivers some hard hits which, though in the most supercilious English vein are not entirely unjust. The following will serve as a specimen:

"In the summer of 1865 a distinguished party of travelers crossed the American continent to California, visited various interesting points in the Pacific States, did an enormous quantity of public speaking, and returned by way of Panama to their homes in the East. The most prominent member of the party was the Hon. Schuyler Colfax, Speaker of the House of Representatives. This gentleman, as our readers will be interested in learning, is 'short, say five feet six, weighs one hundred and forty, is young, say forty-two, has brownish hair and light blue eyes, is a childless widower, drinks no intoxicating liquors, smokes à la General Grant, is tough as a knot, was bred as a printer and editor, but gave up the business for public life, and is the idol of South Bend and all adjacencies.' Next to him came Governor Bross of Illinois, who is, it appears, 'a true unspoiled child of nature,' senior proprietor and editor of the leading journal of the North West, and second officer in the State Government of Illinois. Then there was Mr. Richardson, a gentleman who has led a Bohemian life in all the Western cities, and been twenty months in a Southern prison; but who has, notwithstanding, preserved the 'air of a man who has had a very narrow escape from the pulpit, and cherishes a natural hankering for it yet.' He wears, we are told, 'black broadcloth and 'biled shirts' (the Western phrase for white underclothes), does not chew tobacco, disdains whisky, but drinks French brandy and Cincinnati Catawba, carries a good deal of baggage, does not know how to play poker, and shines brilliantly among the ladies.' We regret that an amiable modesty has prevented the fourth member of the party, Mr. Samuel Bowles, editor of the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, from Illinois, from favoring us with details as to his own personal peculiarities. We are left in darkness as to his height, weight, and complexion, and know not whether his shirts are 'biled" or otherwise. But from the letters which he contributed to the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, and which are here collected, we can form a very fair notion of his inward man. He appears to be as thoroughbred a specimen of the true Yankee editor as we have ever met with in print; and it is the involuntary exhibition of his character which gives to the book such interest as it may possess for persons not about to speculate in the mines of Idaho or Nevada. He has nothing very new or very profound to tell as about Utah or California; his reflections upon society, politics, and scenery are such as occur to ninety-nine out of every hundred of his countrymen; but it is rather curious to accompany this type of the keen self reliant race which is spreading over the whole continent to the latest of their acquisitions. He, of course, looks at everything with the eye of a possible speculator, and his language is everywhere delicately flavored with the appropriate slang. When he has to tell us that the San Francisco ladies dress expensively, he remarks that 'in no other American city would the ladies invoice so high per head as in San Francisco.' He evidently looks upon the filling of pulpits as a commercial question; the demand, he says, is 'for smart effective orators, as well as holy men.' Even the religious condition of a country has its pecuniary aspect. The population of a certain town 'keep Sunday as we do in New England, and as no other population this side of the Missouri now does; and real estate, as you may infer, is quite high—four hundred dollars a front foot for best lots one hundred foot deep.' The inference apparently rests upon the fact that Sunday-keeping implies a fixed, as distinguished from a migratory mining population. Mr. Bowles, of course, indulges in the occasional dashes of tall talk, with a slight spice of blasphemy, which are natural to an American editor; it is hard to determine whether this is merely owing to a confusion between big words and eloquence common to all half-educated people, or to an incapacity for the reverential aspect of things, which brings very sublime topics into queer connections. 'The Yosemite!' he exclaims in a fine rapture; 'as well interpret God in thirty-nine articles as portray it to you by word of month or pen.' Mr. Bowles is of course full of the glorious destinies of the great Republic, though, to do him justice, he does not talk upon this subject more than is inevitable in an American writer; and, in spite of bad taste and bombast, he has a fair measure of the cool, humorous shrewdness which is equally characteristic of his countrymen."

Just fancy the feelings of the complacent Bowles, "Editor of the Springfield Republican"—and of course a man of "rare culture and extensive acquirements," upon finding himself coolly referred to as "half-educated."

THE NAMES OF LONDON STREETS.—The streets of London have been matters of public interest in many ways. One thing that strikes the wanderer through them is the poverty of names which seems to have afflicted London, and which shows itself in singular and intolerable repetitions. There are 36 King streets. How loyalty to the throne is compatible with 36 King streets in London I cannot say. There are 25 Queen streets also, and 3 Queen squares. The House of Brunswick is remembered in 20 George streets and 9 George Yards. There are 34 Charles streets, 32 John streets, 25 Church streets, and 10 Church rows, 20 Princess streets, 18 Duke streets, 17 James, 16 Cross and 11 Chapel streets. Besides these there are unaccountable varieties, such as Old King, New John, Upper Charles, &c., &c. There are 21 New Streets, 6 New roads and 8 New courts. Thirty-two streets are named after Queen Victoria. Six of the dirtiest streets in London are called Paradise streets. There is a stenchy fitness in the naming of Liquorpond street, as there is in the religious literature of Amen Corner, which is reached by Paternoster Row. It is intolerable, however, that some of the vilest and meanest lanes should be named after Shakspeare, Newton and Milton.

IT is a very bad case when a young man parts with his watch, even to prove that "Time is money."

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

SOME of our California ladies have already adopted the new idea of wearing the short gored skirt over a petticoat of contrasting color. In this way old dresses may be made serviceable and appear as well as new. The following fashion items are compiled from the New York Boudoir and other Eastern papers:

DRESS LOOPINGS.

I have before spoken of skirts which are tied at the back with sashes; the fashion is spreading, and, instead of plain sashes, the ends are now ornamented. For example, there is a toilet composed entirely of Egyptian cloth, which is a new material manufactured principally of silk. It is soft in substance, and reminds me of the caméléon, which was only made of wool. The material is speckled all over with either black or white dots on, blue, maize, pearl-gray, or violet grounds. The toilet under consideration was of violet and white Egyptian cloth; the petticoat was trimmed with three rouleaux of violet silk, with a small quilling below to match; the skirt was plain, and was tied at the back, the two ends of the sash being fringed with violet silk; the small square paletot was trimmed with rouleaux to match those on the petticoat, and it had a violet feather fringe all round it.

THE NEW PETTICOAT.

I must not omit to mention the most costly novelty of the season, as well as the prettiest. It is nothing less than petticoats made of white gros de Naples, and ornamented with a band of Oriental embroidery worked in silks of divers hues. This embroidery reproduces palms, such as we see on Indan shawls.

White muslin petticoats never will go out of style, but, as is now the fashion, the muslin used may be a very small amount—the quantity wanting being made up of insertion and lace edging. Indeed, a plain white muslin skirt is almost a thing unknown. Ladies sew, at the very least, a serpentine braidedge on the bottom to preserve the hem from cutting; but it is a commonplace trimming, not near so pretty as a white linen braid stitched on by machine. This braid, if narrow, looks like a cord, and is of use also in making the skirt stiff at the bottom, thus helping it to stick out.

DRESS WAISTS.

The bodies of ball dresses rarely trimmed with draperies, as something more fantastic is desired. The peplum, the Louis XV. body, the Empire body, the square body, and that with folds crossing in front, are all preferred to the bodices berthes. Natural flowers are used in preference to artificial ones for ball dress trimmings. They are arranged as agraffes on the shoulders, as garlands on the skirts, as berthes, and as wide cordons on the bodices.

Braces or bretelles of lace are much worn over dresses which have low bodies; a plastron of lace to match is added on both the back and front of the bodice, so that with these additions very little bodice is visible. Vandykes are still a very popular style of trimming for dresses, etc., only they are now arranged the contrary way from what has been the case up to the present time. Instead of cutting out the material itself of dresses, peplums, and paletots in the form of vandykes, the material is cut straight at the edge, and the vandykes are composed of narrow bands of silk, which are sewed on the dress by a sewing-machine with black or white purse silk, the chain or lock stitch surrounding the vandyke.

HEAD DRESSES.

Combs for evening wear have all a wide straight band of either gold or silver at the top of them. The perforated silver bands, finely chased, and with delicate chains falling on the chignon, are in my opinion in the best taste. Some combs are made with a multitude of these delicate chains festooned to the straight metal band, with precious stones of cameos, and very graceful they look. Tiaras made of plain tortoise shell have become very favorite head dresses for morning wear, and some are enriched with waved gold or silver lines. These tiaras are very useful, because they assist in raising the second bandeau of hair, and now the higher the hair is worn the more graceful effect it is supposed to have.—Necklets are still worn, almost invariably, with high dresses. They are made of gold—a thick gold cord, with a locket suspended from the centre; or of filigree silver, when several fine chains encircle the throat; or the necklet is composed of large amethyst, or rock crystal, or alabaster beads—the variety is endless.

SPIRADELLA.

INDUSTRY.—Every young man should remember that the world will always honor industry. The vulgar and useless idler, whose energies of body and mind are rusting for want of occupation, may look with scorn upon the laborer, engaged at his toil; but his scorn is praise, his contempt honor. Dean Swift says he never knew a man rise to eminence who lay late in bed in the morning.

WITH the most ardent nature it is either love or hate; there is no twilight in the tropics.

POVERTY is the only load which is the heavier the more loved ones there are to assist in supporting it.

AMUSEMENTS.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.—The engagement of Miss Alice Kingsbury at this theatre terminates with the coming week; which will probably be the last opportunity the public will have to see her charming personations. This afternoon Little Barefoot will be played, and this evening the Child of the Savana. Monday evening is set aside for the complimentary benefit, tendered by Miss Alice Kingsburry and Manager Maguire, to Mrs. Harry Jackson in recognition of the very efficient support rendered to Miss Kingsbury during her engagement by Mrs. Jackson, who has most kindly stepped aside from her position as first lady of the company, and accepted minor parts to strengthen the cast and give more completeness to the representations of Miss Kingsbury's peculiar repertoire. Mrs. Jackson is a talented, worthy and most versatile member of her profession, and no doubt will receive from an appreciative public the same recognition that Miss Kingsbury and Manager Maguire tender her—a benefit that will indeed be a "complimentary" one. Mr. Harry Jackson makes his re-appearance as a member of the Opera House company on this occasion.

On Wednesday Mr. W. A. Kendall, a member of the press, who has been prostrated by a severe and dangerous fever for more than two months, and is still incapacitated from attending to the duties of his profession, will be tendered a benefit, which we sincerely trust may prove a substantial one. Manager Maguire has been kind enough to give the use of his theatre for that night, and warm-hearted little Kingsbury and others have volunteered. Mr. Kendall is, perhaps, better known to the public by his nom de plume of "Comet Quirls," over which signature he has contributed numerous poetic effusion of acknowledged merit to our local press for years past.

Tuesday and Thursday, last nights of Fanchon. On Friday evening Miss Kingsbury has her benefit. If the reader thinks of going to it he had better, at once, step up to Captain Howard's box-office and secure seats for himself and ladies, or the probabilities are he will not be able to get in the theatre when that event comes off. Romeo and Juliet will be played for the occasion, Miss Kingsbury playing the loving "Juliet."

Mr. McCullough's benefit on Monday evening last was a success. The attendance was most flattering both in quality and numbers; and the gentleman's Hamlet was a very creditable rendition of that metaphysical character.

THE THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF PACIFIC LODGE was celebrated at Platt's Hall on Wednesday evening last. The performance of Black Eyed Susan by amateurs was very good. Mr. Leszynsky's "William" was given with much power and feeling, the only fault being too much overacting in the emotional parts. "Blue Peter" by Miss Augusta Livingston, with song and dance, and "Susan" by Miss Therese Scherk, were also commendably personated. In fact the general acting of this piece, with all the minor supports, was much better than that usually given by amateur associations. The veteran Stage Manager, Mr. James Dowling, acted as superintendent and acting manager for the association, and the teachings of their mentor, were visible in the general perfectness of the performance. The Misses Lacmlein played several pieces of piano-forte music and exhibited great improvement. They were rewarded with great applause. A social ball closed the festival. The attendance was very large, and the amount accumulated for the Widows' and Orphans' Fund must have been considerable.

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.—The first performance of the Martinetti Troupe was given on Thursday evening, as was expected, to an immense audience. The "Operetta" announced as Le Chalet, or To Marry or Not to Marry, turned out to be that old stager, The Swiss Cottage, with "Natz Teik," "Corporal Max," etc., under a new name, which proved to be a greater delusion to the audience than any of the tricks of the pantominic Martinetti family that followed. The "Operetta" was very creditably given, however, by the Howson Troupe. After which Prof. Charley Schultz, greeted by a hearty round of applause as a "welcome home," took the bâton to conduct his orchestra in the overture to the Poet and Peasant, in which, by the way, the violoncello obligato was admirably played by Mr. F. A. Howson. The ballet, the Contrabandist, followed without any particular marked effect except introducing those old time favorites, Phillipe and Julien Martinetti, Mme. Desire Mathieu, "little Paul," (little no longer,) and others. The premier danseuse, Mme. Marzetti, is a graceful artist, and was aided by the ladies of the ballet. Several fine tableaux were given. The well known Pantomine of the Green Monster concluded the performance, which was greeted with considerable laughter and applause. The same bill was repeated last night.

M. AND MME. JOSEPH HEINE gave their first concert at Platt's Hall on Monday evening last, to an appreciative but not very numerous audience. M. Heine, though born blind, and though still apparently quite young, has attained a mastery of his instrument which not only excites the admiration of those familiar with its technical difficulties, but gives the keenest pleasure even to an uncultivated ear; and we welcome him as a true artist, who loves music as his life, and devotes himself tenderly and reverently to its interpretation, never obtruding his own personality, nor his acquired skill, between the music and the listener. His style is that of a master, although we think it would be improved by a shade less of emphasis on the turns and cadenzas, which are played with singular grace, but are made of more relative importance than would be justified by a taste more fully matured. In purity of tone, absolute truth of intonation, and depth of feeling and expression, we have rarely heard his equal; nor do we miss anything in his execution, which is marked by wonderful precision, though perhaps neither so rapid nor so brilliant as that of Paul Julien. In Paganini's solo for one string, on themes from Moses in Egypt, and in an original fantasia on "Ever of Thee," given as an encore, M. Heine excited great enthusiasm; the fantasia by Ernst, on themes from Il Pirata, was also exquisitely rendered.

Mme. Heine, an accomplished pianist, appeared in a grand rondo by Mendelssohn, and in Litolff's rather trifling Spinnlied; she also played the accompaniments for her husband's violin, with rare delicacy and skill. The vocal part of the programme was acceptably filled by Signor and Signora Bianchi, the Misses Howson, and Mr. Crowley; while Mr. Geo. T. Evans officiated at the piano, with his usual ability, spite of the embarrassment caused by the unexpected high pitch of the instrument, obliging him to transpose the accompaniments into remote keys, and nearly giving serious trouble in the duet from Rigoletto. The concert as a whole was so much enjoyed that nearly every piece met a hearty encore; and we trust that the second entertainment of the series will soon be announced.

TAKE HEART.

ALL day the stormy wind has blown
From off the dark and rainy sea;
No bird has past the window flown,
The only song has been the moan—
The wind made in the willow tree.

This is the Summer's burial time.
She died when dropped the earliest leaves,
And, cold upon her rosy prime,
Fell down the Autumn's frosty rime—
Yet I am not as one that grieves.

For well I know o'er sunny seas
The blue bird waits for April skies;
And at the roots of forest trees
The May-flowers sleep in fragrant ease,
And violets hide their azure eyes.

O thou, by winds of grief o'erblown
Beside some golden Summer's bier—
Take heart! Thy birds are only flown,
Thy blossoms sleeping, tearful sown,
To greet thee in the immortal year!

MEN AND WOMEN.—Men love things, as facts, possessions, and estates, and women persons; and while a man regards only abstract scientific facts, a woman looks only at the person in whom they are embodied. Even in childhood the girl loves an imitation of humanity, her doll, and works for it; the boy gets a hobby-horse or tools, and works with them. But the noblest quality wherewith nature has endowed woman for the good of the world is love—that love which seeks no sympathy and no return. The child is the object of love, and kisses, and watching, and answers them only by complaint and anger; and the feeble creature that requires the most repays the least. But the mother goes on; her love only grows stronger the greater the need and the unthankfulness of its object—and while fathers prefer the strongest of their children, the mother feels more love for the feeble and garrulous.

THE GUIDE TO FOLLOW.—Taste, not fashion, is the guide to follow in all matters of dress. It is because the French understand that so well, that they carry the art of the toilet to great perfection. In France dress is always harmonious with the personality of the man or woman; so much so, that you can almost tell the age of a person by the way he or she dresses. Not so with us, certainly! Our insane love for show betrays us into all sorts of incongruities of fashion, and little by little we become nothing more than velvets or ribbons, while the years sit cross-legged at the corner of our eyes, and and we see them not!

POPULATION.—It is estimated that the population of this country has increased at the rate of almost a million a year since the last national census was taken, in '60,—and this in spite of the loss of half million of lives in the civil war, and of lives that, in the strictest sense, belonged to the producing classes.

"MARK TWAIN"—Who did not sail on the last steamer as we announced last week, is to deliver his lecture on the Sandwich Islands at Petaluma to-night.

AN old bachelor being laughed at by a party of pretty girls, told them—"You are 'small potatoes.'" "We may be small potatoes," cried one of them, "but we are sweet ones."

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 7.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

From the Manifesto of the Principles of the American Medical Society—"Multitudes of people in this country and in Europe exhibit an utter want of confidence in physicians and their physic. The cause is evident: Erroneous theory, and springing from it, injurious—often, very often, fatal—practice. Nothing will now subserve the absolute requisitions of an intelligent community but a medical doctrine grounded upon right reason, in harmony with and avouched by the unerring laws of nature and of the vital human organism, and authenticated and confirmed by successful results. In one word, Medicine must be redeemed, the manacles and fetters which environ it must be snapped asunder, and it must be rendered the HEALING ART or perish! Such, we have no doubt, is the invincible determination of the large public; and this is no hasty verdict, no passing cloud, no mere temporary popular ebullition. The feeling widens, deepens, is ineradicable.

"False theory, false induction, inefficient or fatal practice, these are the all-sufficient reasons for the popular dislike, discontent, disgust and detestation. Judged by its own authors, it stands self-condemned before the world."

THE SICK are guaranteed perfect cures in almost all cases of disease by Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Why does he do so? Because he has had an experience and close observation during more than twenty-five years, which has made him master of the healing art; and besides, he uses no medicines, whatever, to poison and injure his patients. Sick people, possessed of common sense, sometimes called "horse sense," are requested to call on Dr. Bourne. No others.

Quoting many eminent medical writers the "Manifesto," continues: "Enough! Judged and repudiated by its most illustrious authors, those best acquainted with it, and of course best qualified to judge, discarded and scorned by a large, intelligent and influential portion of the people, old school Allopathy is dying of marasmus, it will linger for some time longer, but it is moribund—the most eminent of the faculty have pronounced its doom, and soon will it go down to the tomb of the Capulets without hope, or possibility of resurrection."

THE sick can always be either cured or greatly relieved when all other means have failed, by applying to DR. BOURNE, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

CURES guaranteed without medicines; very pleasant method, quick and satisfactory in all respects, by DR. BOURNE, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

MEAGHER, TAAFFE & CO.—From the extensive business and business resources of this firm, aided by their liberal system of advertising, the firm-name at the head of this article must be very familiar with the public. A recent visit to their large retail store surprised us as to the extent and variety of their business.

Innumerable shelves extend through the whole length of the store crowded with the choicest dress fabrics—silks that will almost stand alone; merinos, poplins, rich laces and embroideries—cloaks and shawls, hosiery and furnishing goods. All divided into departments, and each presided over by a competent corps of salesmen proficient in their particular line of goods.

Great pyramids of house-keeping and domestic goods—linens, flannels, blankets, sheetings and shirtings—as well as of dress goods, stand in the middle of the floor and on the ends of spare counters. Everything betokens the immense business and resources of the firm; who established their retail store only about two years ago, although their business now far excels that of any of their competitors.

The great success of MEAGHER, TAAFFE & CO., is simply that they have invested a sufficient capital to import direct, buying their staple articles from the manufacturer at the lowest cash rates, and are always ready with the cash, both in New York and in San Francisco, to take advantage of the large invoice cash auction sales, and purchase largely at the lowest rates under the hammer of the auctioneer. Goods so sold are of course disposed of greatly under prices. They are immediately sent to their retail store, and soon retailed over the counter at a slight advance—to be followed again by other auction purchases. It is these purchases that are advertised in the city papers every few weeks, and it is by this system of business that this house has acquired its tremendous patronage. The female portion of the community, ever alive to the procuring of bargains, know they can find them at MEAGHER, TAAFFE & CO.'s, and there they will go to make their purchases.

THE "HAYDEE" MURDERERS.—It is seldom that any case of capital crime is attended by circumstances of greater atrocity, than marked the dreadful murder perpetrated on the Haydee by Carlos Magne and Francisco Lazarini, recently executed at Mazatlan. These men belonged to no ordinary class of murderers, and are entitled to a horrible pre-eminence among modern criminals. An hour before their execution they were singing and laughing, apparently in excellent spirits, and on their way to the place where they were to suffer the penalty of their crime, both were tranquil and undaunted Magne smoked a cigar all the way to the spot, and, on arriving, the two leaped lightly from the cart, with every appearance of cheerful alacrity. The men were sentenced to be shot, and just before the word was given to "fire!" Magne shouted "Vive la France!" in a loud clear voice. Neither of the criminals was despatched at the first fire, another being necessary to complete the work. The heads of these extraordinary malefactors have been sent to this city preserved in spirits, and may be seen by those who are curious in such matters, at DR. JORDAN'S ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.

STYLE—Gives prominence and superiority to everything; and in nothing more particularly so than in dress. It is their "style" that have made the custom-made clothing of the house of J. R. Mead & Co., so very popular with those who would dress well. This firm pride themselves on the style of their fall clothing, an extensive stock of which they have just opened—new, tasty and dressy. J. R. Mead & Co.'s down-town store is on the corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, their up-town store is on the corner of Washington and Sansome streets.

FIVE NEW GRAND PIANOS—For sale to day at 12 o'clock, by Cobb & Sinton, at their auction rooms, on California street, near Sansome. They will probably go very cheap.

WOODWARD'S GARDEN.—Every stranger should visit this delightful suburbial resort. The Museum, the picture gallery, the vintage and the collection of preserved birds and beasts are all under cover.

SONG.

BY T. B. ALDRICH.

IT was with doubt and trembling,
I whispered in her ear:—
Oh! take her answer, bonny bird,
That all the world may hear!

Sing it—sing it, Silver-throat,
Upon the way side tree,
How fair she is, how true she is,
And how she loveth me!

Sing it—sing it, Silver-throat,
And all the summer long
The other birds shall envy you,
For knowing such a song!

A VISIT TO JUAN FERNANDEZ.

THERE is an island wilderness, far in the South Pacific, that has a romantic history, and in my humble opinion, one that has had something to do with the history of both England and America. I refer to Juan Fernandez.

Several years ago I was aboard of a New Bedford whaler that called at this island for wood and water. I stepped upon its shore in Cumberland Bay, on the north part of the island, and landed with an indescribable feeling of interest such as I had never before experienced, even when first landing from a long voyage in a foreign and tropical land. I was on the scene where the romantic adventures of Robinson Crusoe were supposed to have occurred, and, for a moment, the well-remembered enchantment of Defoe's delightful romance again enthralled my spirit.

It was that romance that had first turned my thoughts from school to the cocoa-groves of far-off regions; and, in my wanderings on "the element that never tires," I have met with many who, like me, have been led from home to wander in foreign lands by reading the story of Robinson Crusoe. It is partly for this reason that I have said that Juan Fernandez has had something to do with the history of the two great maritime nations. What I felt, thousands have felt. Their love of adventure has been prompted or cherished by reading the story of Defoe, which, therefore, has had much to do with the history of the great maritime powers. In confirmation of this belief, I have the characteristic remark of a young Irish shipmate, who, on first stepping ashore on Juan Fernandez, observed, "Had it not been for this island, I should not be here now!"

I have stated that I landed on the island with an indescribable feeling of interest. Such must certainly have been the case, for, during the first half-hour of my wanderings along the shore of the bay, my eyes were often trying to discover something of the ruins of Mr. Crusoe's hut. No trace of this distinguished residence was found, but, instead, we saw the dwellings of two Chilian families, and a hut inhabited by two sailors, who immediately wished to drink to our better acquaintance.

The sailors, one of whom was English and the other American, had a little industry; but perhaps this was not much to their credit, for it was apparently only inspired by a love of rum and tobacco. Their industry was displayed in providing for the wants of whaling vessels that occasionally call at the island. They cut wood, and acted as guides in hunting the wild goats on the mountains. The Chilians did little more than live. Their principal amusements, we were told, were smoking cigaritas while listening to a young man of one of the families twang a guitar.

Juan Fernandez is about thirteen miles in length, and seven in its greatest breadth, and is situate one hundred and ten leagues from the coast of Chili. It has been the sight of many strange scenes. It was once a favorite rendezvous for buccaneers who lived by preying on the Spanish merchant vessels laden with the riches of Chili and Peru.

Many celebrated English navigators, such as Dampier, Byron, and Lord Anson, have visited the island. The visit of the latter was made in the year 1741, or about thirty-one years after Alexander Selkirk, whose history suggested to Defoe the tale of Robinson Crusoe, had been removed from the island.

Anson and his squadron had had a long and stormy passage round Cape Horn, and the crews of the vessels, on reaching the island, were dying with scurvy. So enervated were all by this disease, that they could hardly bring the vessels to anchor. On board the Centurion, the commodore's ship, two hundred and ninety-two men had been lost; and of the two hundred and fourteen that remained, nearly all were affected with the disease.

The Gloucester, another of Anson's ships, lost an equal number of men, and on entering Cumberland Bay, after being a month vainly endeavoring to work in, there were but eighty-two men alive, and the most of them were in a dying state. A few days more and the vessel would have drifted about the ocean, a floating coffin for a few of those who had once comprised its crew.

So wonderful is the effect of fresh vegetable food and fish in combating the disease, that a residence of three months, living on the antiscorbutic food growing on the island in great variety, restored to perfect health all except a few who were too far gone with the disease, and were only taken shore to die

Juan Fernandez is a very fertile island, and in this respect it cannot, perhaps, be better described than by one or two quotations from Anson's voyages, wherein it is stated that "the excellence of the climate and looseness of the soil render this place extremely proper for all kinds of vegetation; for if the ground be anywhere accidentally turned up, it is immediately overgrown with turnips and Sicilian radishes." Again, in the same work, it is stated that "some particular spots occur in these valleys where the shade and fragrance of the contiguous woods, the loftiness of the overhanging rocks, the transparency and frequent falls of the neighboring streams present scenes of such elegance and dignity as would with difficulty be rivalled in any other part of the globe. It is in this place, perhaps, that the simple productions of unassisted nature may be said to excel all the fictitious descriptions of the most animated imagination."

If this could be said of the island then, who shall describe it at the time of my visit, when its productions had been wonderfully increased, and principally by Commodore Anson's efforts? He planted on the island many seeds, besides the stones of apricots, plums, and peaches; and a large variety of the best fruit, unknown on the island in Anson's time, is now growing there.

Eight years after Anson's visit the Spaniards established a penal settlement at Juan Fernandez. The convicts were kept part of the time in some caves in a high hill facing the harbor. In 1751 this settlement was broken up by an earthquake which destroyed thirty-five people, including the governor and his family.

Not long after Chili obtained its independence from Spain, its government established another penal settlement on the island, and the place again became a scene of murders and mutinies, until the island was deserted.

Some families from Chili once came to reside on the island, and were joined by some sailors who had absconded from a whaler. The sailors could or would not conduct themselves in a proper manner, and were all killed by the Chilians. The island was again deserted, the Chilians being taken to Valparaiso, where they were tried for murder and acquitted. Extremes meet. Juan Fernandez, with all its resemblance to what we may call a paradise, sometimes exhibits a little evidence that man alone may be vile amidst scenes of natural innocence and loveliness.

In 1835 a volcanic eruption took place at sea one mile from the land, in four hundred and eighty feet of water. For twenty-four hours, smoke, water, and fire were thrown into the sky.

From each of the many settlements that have been made on the island and afterwards broken up, various domestic animals, such as goats, dogs, cats, and donkeys, have been left to look after themselves, and at the time of our visit were running wild, the dogs being at war with all the others. In this war the goats are the favorite game of the dogs, and they would long ago have been exterminated, had nature not endowed them with the ability of leaping from rock to rock on the mountains, and thus gaining places where they are safe from the pursuit of their enemies.

We stayed three days at the island, and one of those days was devoted by the officers to the amusement and business of goat-hunting. I was then foolish enough to think myself fortunate in being one of the crew who was chosen to accompany them in the hunt. The two runaway sailors who had made the island their home acted as guides, and we started for the mountains.

On our way up the valleys we passed groves of fruit-trees, several varieties being in full bearing. This was in the latter part of December; and on the sides of the little hillocks we found the ground red with wild strawberries.

The native forest trees, or those not introduced into the island by Anson and others, are nearly all aromatic. The largest tree on the island is the myrtle, but we saw none of these that could be called large.

Although the forest, unlike those of most islands of the Pacific, are free from undergrowth, our journey to the mountains was not free from much toil; for our guides, in place of leading us up one winding valley, conducted us over many of the hills that divided several. The fatigue, however, of climbing the hills and crossing the streams, under a hot sun, was endured with a strange feeling of satisfaction that I have never met with while visiting the lions of a large city.

The island is a place no thinking mariner can visit without emotions peculiar to his profession. I was on a lone and nearly uninhabited island, one that should be the abode of several thousands of people, but one that had often proved fatal to those who had striven to tame the wilderness, and seems doomed to be a place where there shall only be enough of human life to feel that the island can be a home for solitude—about which, I suppose, Alexander Selkirk's poetical opinion is also the practical one:

"O solitude! where are the charms
That sages have seen in thy face?
Better dwell in the midst of alarms
Than reign in this horrible place.

"I am out of humanity's reach,
I must finish my journey alone.
Never hear the sweet music of speech;
I start at the sound of my own."

The valleys and hills we crossed had once been familiar to the adventurous men who sailed with the old English and Spanish navigators of whom I had been in childhood so delighted to read. I could nearly fancy that the footsteps of the long departed should be distinctly seen. When viewing the historical scenes of thickly and long inhabited lands, this feeling cannot so strongly arise. The streets and fields we behold are trodden every day by many feet, and we cannot fancy that we may have been their only visitors since the time to which our memory strays.

The goats on the island are not easily obtained. They are constantly hunted by the wild dogs, and occasionally by the officers of whaling vessels. On our approaching them they fled to their well-known retreats on the mountains, from which they seldom stray far. They are not now as they have been described by the poet Cowper, in his beautiful lines upon "Alexander Selkirk;" for they were so well "acquainted with man" that their "tameness" was anything but "shocking" to us. After about four hours hard work, we obtained three goats. Three or four others were shot, but fell in places inaccessible to us, and had, to our regret at the needless slaughter, to be left, like Selkirk, "out of humanity's reach."

The goats' flesh was an agreeable change from our usual "salt horse" and pork; but I believe that the dinner we made of them was made most agreeable by the fancy of most of the men that they were eating some of "Crusoe's goats."

During the night of the third day at the island the anchor was hove, and in a few hours we "ran the place under water," with the hope that we should never see it again. Independent of its romantic associations, Juan Fernandez is worth seeing once; but whoever see it twice is unfortunate—unfortunate in wandering too long and far for happiness. From its position on the globe—its loneliness, its beauty and fertility—the island hardly seems a part of this earth, but a fragment of another. This assertion, applicable to its loveliness as well as its loneliness, is partly confirmed by an observation I once heard made by a sailor, who boasted that he had been "all over the world and to Juan Fernandez!"

SPAIN.

TO the tourist entering Spain three things start prominently forward to attract his attention. First, the heat; second, the cigarettes; and third, the priests. About the heat there can be no manner of doubt; the sun bakes down from a clear, dark-blue sky, and is reflected from houses aggravatingly white and dazzling, from green blinds painfully brilliant, from red tiles overpoweringly glaring, and from dusty roads painfully, chokingly hot. The Spanish side of the Pyrenees is always brighter than the French; whenever clouds roll along valleys and cap mountains in this part of the world, it is upon the French side. I have myself, in crossing one of the highest of the Pyrenean passes, ascended, on the French side, through thick cloud, opaque mist, and pertinacious drizzle, to cross the narrow ridge which divides the two kingdoms, to find the Spanish side bathed in sunlight, and the peaks of the high mountains standing out clear and sharp against a blue-black sky; and this is a common occurrence. This, I believe, is accounted for by the difference in soil: that of France being fertile to luxuriance, while the land on the Spanish side is hard, dry, and stony, with comparatively little vegetation.

With respect to the cigarettes, most nations have their peculiarities in tobacco and the mode of using it. The English through the clay pipe; the Germans through long stems from china bowls; the Turks through serpentine tubes. The French and Americans smoke cigars; while in Spain the national mode of smoking is the white-paper cigarette. All classes, from the highest to the lowest, insert the little paper tube between their lips, and suffer the pale-blue fragrant smoke to curl in and about their dark beards and luxuriant moustaches. It must strike every visitor in Spain—that appearance of men of all ages placidly puffing at their white cigarettes, at all times and in all places, lighting one from the ashes of another, and inhaling the smoke as if it were the pure air.

As every one, on visiting France for the first time, must have been surprised at the extraordinary number of uniformed men walking and lounging in the streets, so, in passing through a Spanish town, every one must have remarked the black-robed, strangely-hatted priests, who, with eyes bent on the ground, pass in every direction. Spain is doubtless the most priest-ridden country in the world; her sovereign is said to be entirely under the influence of the Church; and perhaps never was country, so admirably supplied by nature with all the requisites for greatness and prosperity, so sluggish, so involved, and so far behind its neighbors. Naturally, amongst these priests there are many large-minded, talented, clever, energetic men; but, as a rule, their education and their employment conduce to narrow-mindedness, and render them unfit to promote the commercial prosperity of a country.

WEALTH, and rank, and beauty may form a brilliant setting to the diamond, but they only expose more nakedly the false glare of paste.

TACT.

TACT is usually spoken of as if it were a virtue, but in reality it is nothing of the kind. It can scarcely be said to be much more than the faculty of moving through the world without friction—a faculty which for practical purposes is valuable enough, but which may be used, and is used, indifferently both for good and for evil. Some men have a turn for going through life like the fretful porcupine, with every single quill bristling and on end. There is a sort of snuffy Scotch way of looking at things, which shows itself in saying the wrong thing, upon principle, at the wrong time and to the wrong people. From this point of view tact would probably be considered as a species of moral and social crime; and some persons go so far as to consider it a religious duty to have no tact, and are inclined to think that the text which tells us that the Apostle was all things to all men must be erroneously translated, and must have meant something entirely different in the original Greek. Tact does not lead many men to heaven, and it leads a good many men to a place which may, for the sake of euphony, be called the antipodes of heaven. In endeavoring to avoid offence to their fellow-creatures, they sacrifice a principle or a duty, and end by insensibly sliding down the soft and smooth decline down which those descend who are always for making all things pleasant. Familiarity with such a spectacle induces preachers and essayists to undervalue tact, just as men of the world are disposed to overrate it. The truth is, as we began by saying, that it is not a virtue, nor, on the other hand, is it a vice. Like many other faculties, it takes its moral hue from the circumstances of each case; but it does not from necessity imply any state of moral character at all. It is solely and purely a capacity of getting easily along, and of managing the idosyncrasies and peculiarities of those among whom our lot is cast—a power of making the most of the stream when it is with us, and the least of the stream when it is against us. There is a male tact and a female tact, and the two are independent of one another. It is impossible to possess tact without possessing an insight into the character and feelings of one's fellow-men; but this insight may be either of an intellectual or a sympathetic sort.

One can see by experience how entirely a clever man's tact differs often from the tact of a refined woman. A woman's is made up chiefly of keen and sensitive feeling with which shrewdness and mental grasp have nothing to do. Some kind of natural instinct enables her to sympathize with the passing sensations of those about her, and, in virtue of an internal sense, which is just as real a sense for her as her sense of touch or sight, she can throw herself into the mood and frame of mind of those whom she is near. This capacity a woman acquires partly from the ordinary training of women, which quickens their sensibility, and partly from the habit of observing and studying small matters which is a necessity of their social and domestic life. They gain by long practice the power of catching looks, gestures, and shades of expression in the face or in the eye, which less experienced observers never would notice; and their womanly feelings eke out the powers of observation.

There is another kind of tact, which may be called male tact in opposition to female, which springs not from the heart so much as from the head. Female tact helps those who have it to be pleasant companions, to shine in society, to mould and animate conversation, and to avoid everything of the nature of a personal contretemps. Male tact depends on the power of reading character. This latter and more thorough insight into character requires a real knowledge of the world, and an acquaintance with the ordinary habits and actions of men, which women cannot and ought not to desire to possess. The tact that is of advantage in the daily conduct of the affairs of men is based on intellectual rather than on moral qualities. It is a sort of fine intellectual sense, which may be made finer every day, like other senses, by use. The ideal diplomatist, the ideal orator, and the ideal man of the world may be taken as its type and representative. Their touch is sometimes as soft and velvety as a woman's, and there is something of a woman's sensibility about it, only that it depends less on a reluctance to give pain than on a clear perception of what will move, and persuade, and attract. It is not easy to draw the line severely between these two species of tact. They approximate towards and run into one another. But that there is a real and tangible difference between the two becomes apparent if we only consider for a moment the various and dissimilar characters to which tact is seen united. If tact were made up entirely of sympathy, one would expect to find it joined invariably to a warm and philanthropic heart. No expectation could be more belied by fact. People who have tact, as often as not, are cold, calculating, and heartless. Like consummate actors, they are so accustomed to fling themselves into the position of the hour that every situation passes equally lightly over them, and they are everything by turns and nothing long. They have utterly forgotten to-morrow the person whom they have taken such pains to conciliate to-day. Their life is a long course of hypocrisy, though the hypocrisy loses half its ugliness when one considers that it is unconscious and undesigned. Cruelty is by no means an unfrequent concomitant of tact. Even among women the ill-omened union of the two is sometimes seen. But among men, whose tact is rather intellectual than moral, the conjunction of the two seemingly incongruous qualities is very common. The art of managing men continually goes hand in hand with great and remarkable insensibility to the pain caused by it, and diplomatists accordingly figure as the embodiment of cruelty quite as much as they are the embodiment of tact.

It is to be noticed that tact is one of the very few characteristics that are almost entirely independent of age. Children often have a far greater share of tact than grown-up men and women. As men advance in life they acquire more and more experience of character, but they become more and more engrossed in themselves and in their own pursuits, and have less leisure or inclination to devote to the observation of others. Middle age blunts the sensibilities. When the blossom of life is over, and when one has enjoyed the first flavor of romance and the novelty of social intercourse, men grow careless about restraining themselves; personal crotchets and unsociable habits fix themselves on them, and they become more careless about pleasing those they meet. As the use of the sense lessens, the sense itself decays. Tact, as its name implies, is only a fine touch, and the fineness of the touch diminishes as it ceases to be refined by constant employment and occupation. All the knowledge of character and of the world which one adds to one's store as one increases in age does not make up for the declension of sensibility. Nobody can be a master of the science of tact without being able to be, or to seem, enthusiastic. Nor can anybody be a master of it without devoting his thoughts to the observation of his friends and acquaintances. As their years advance, men and women show themselves more and more disinclined to study either the peculiarities or the faults of others. For this reason the tact of young men is often equal, if not superior, to the tact of their elders. They blunder constantly from ignorance of the world, but they do not blunder so often from carelessness as to the feelings of others. Tact with women lasts longer into the afternoon of life. The reason probably is that women have more to gain by cultivating and preserving it. A vast portion of a woman's happiness depends upon her social powers. If she has not the faculty of making and of keeping together a circle of friends and of acquaintances, it is her lot to be subjected to incessant mortifications, and for the sake of her ambition she remains attentive up to the last to the art of pleasing. Her ambition and her success depend on it, and when she ceases to care to attract, it is always at a time when she ceases to have any interests on this side of the grave. Masculine ambition is of a differennt sort, and its realization is not so dependent on the social qualities of its possessor. Men succeed in life by being powerful and rich and clever, or by having those who are powerful and rich to back them, not by making themselves agreeable companions; and the polish they put on when they enter society imperceptibly and gradually wears off. Selfishness comes over them; and though men who are selfish may have tact if they make it a study and a profession, selfish men cannot have tact naturally, unless their selfishness is made up of an excessive sensibility and self-consciousness. Professional tacticians accordingly may be of any age; but tact, the natural and spontaneous article which is the product of refinement and sensibility, belongs to an earlier and ante-middle-age period.

THE PEARL HARVEST.

AT the commencement of the fishery a signal gun is fired at midnight, when the fleet immediately sets sail—the ardanapanaars, or headmen, of the fisher caste leading the way with a light shining, as a guide to those who follow; a light is also shown at intervals by the Government guard-ship. Starting at so early an hour, the boats reach the vessel long before daylight, and they are required to anchor till they can see to fish. Soon after sunrise a signal gun directs the fleet to proceed to the fishing-ground, and at half-past six the hoisting of a flag permits the divers to begin their labor. Immediately five or six hundred swarthy, naked figures plunge into the tranquil waters. Active operations are usually carried on for six hours, the divers descending into and rising from the water with great regularity.

Each boat is furnished with five diving-stones, with a complement of two divers to each stone. The divers belonging to each stone go down time about; while one is down the other is breathing and resting.

Divers are generally of the Parawa caste, from the coasts of Madura, Jaffna and Manaar, and the pearl-fishery is, in a sense, a recreation for them.

The shark-charmer, a cunning person, who is considered so indispensable to the fishery that he is paid by Government, is constantly in attendance at the fishing-bank. At one time, the charmer used to be allowed a percentage of one oyster per day from each diver, but this has been commuted into a money payment. Accidents have never been known to occur on the pearl-banks from sharks, which is of course attributed by the superstitious natives to the wise charming of the charmer; but it is quite easy to suppose that the noise made by so many divers frightens away these ferocious monstess. Exaggerated stories have been told of the time that a pearl-diver can remain under water; two minutes and even three having been mentioned as the common time; but fifty seconds is the usual period when the men are regularly at work; instances have, however, been frequent of an immersion lasting for eighty and even eighty-seven seconds.

The divers enter strenuously into their work, and a good hand will, when the mussels are plentiful, send us as many as three thousand in the course of the six hours he is on the pearl-ground. At a given signal the fishery ceases for the day; then the crews which have been lucky shout for joy, and others, who have obtained but a scant supply, linger on the bank till driven away by the guards. If the breeze be not strong enough to carry the boats to the shore, the men have to take the oars and row them home.

Meantime the boat-owner has been in utter anxiety to know what luck his boat has had, and the moment the little vessel reaches the shore he springs forward to ascertain the result of the day's diving, and to look over and fondle the wealth-giving shells. Others, who are speculating in the fishery, are quite as anxious about the day's take; and the fact is, that the thousands of people who gather on the coast—and they are so numerous that it looks as if a large town had suddenly been set down by the sea-side—are more or less speculators in the fishery; it is one great lottery.

All kinds of people are assembled, and they are from all countries, and are of all colors, of many castes, and of very different occupations; they erect with great rapidity huts, tents, bazaars, and shops; there are sutler's jewellers, and merchants of all kinds on the scene, the grand idea being, there as everywhere else, to make money. Everybody speculates, from the wealthy Hindoo merchant, who buys the right of fishing, down to the humblest outcast—for there are questionable characters of all kinds to be seen around, monks, fakirs, beggars, and the like.

Strokes of luck are constantly being announced; a poor man may buy a fanani's worth of shells, and find himself in consequence of his purchase in possession of a little fortune. One person, at a recent fishery, bought three shells for a sum which could be represented by two-pence of our money, and in one of the shells he found the largest pearl of that year's fisbing. A pearl-fishery is as exciting to the natives of the East, as the Derby or Leger to a Londoner.

When the fleet arrives with the mussels, they are all carried ashore and are divided into four heaps three of which are selected by Government when the fishery is carried on by the executive, the other being the property of the boat owners, to be divided amongst the divers, rowers, and others.

The shells are exposed in heaps or in pits, so that the pearls may be rotted out of them—the flesh of the fish never being eaten except by very low-caste natives; they are kept till the end of the fishery, and then placed in canoes to be washed. Poor buyers, however, cannot afford to wait, but seek out the pearls at once, at a considerable loss. Every individual shell is carefully washed and examined, and the pearls picked out, and afterwards the canoe itself is submitted to a series of washings, in order to find out such pearls as may have escaped observation. These are usually found among the sand, children being employed to give a last look over the debris, in order that their young eyes may pick out the small seed-pearls which are sure to escape the eyes of the older people.

The pearls are assorted into ten or twelve sizes by being riddled through a series of perforated brass saucers or colanders, fitting closely into each other, the first of which has twenty holes in it, and those pearls which do not escape from it are called the twentieth basket. The other baskets have each an increasing number of holes, thirty, eighty, one hundred, and progressing to a thousand perforations; each basket, of course, giving its name to the gem it contains, as pearls of the fiftieth basket, and so on.

The price of the pearls is fixed per "chow," a local term which gathers into one word size, form, color and weight, thus enabling the quality to be appraised. As to the yield of pearls, it may be stated that it is most uncertain; as many as one hundred pearls of various sizes have been found in one shell, and oftentimes a hundred and fifty shells may be opened and not one pearl be seen.

CHILDHOOD has little retrospection; its heart and soul are in the future, a glorified dream. Memory, with all its pleasures and pains, is for the old, and chiefly for the prematurely old; but youth, is a vision of the islands of the blest; it tells its own fairy tale to itself, and is at once the inventor and the hero.

A STORY is related of an enterprising editor in an interior town, who, finding the body of a man hanging to a lamp-post one night, after his own paper had gone to press, cut it down and carried it home, to prevent his rival from publishing the news—and was himself indicted for the murder.

NOTHING keeps a young man back so much, when he is attempting to get on, as a corn.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1866.

Black Sheep.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued in to-day's Californian.

A SENSATIONAL VIEW OF FENIANISM.

TOO many it has seemed no easy thing to believe that the real inspirers and leading spirits of the Fenian movement could be so wanting in practical sagacity as seriously to contemplate an invasion of Ireland from the United States. Though the ignorant and passionate spirits who constitute the great bulk of the rank and file of the destined "army of invasion" may be unable to appreciate the magnitude of the difficulties that lie in the way of such a project, and that render the attempt to execute it little short of madness, it seems scarcely reasonable to attribute the same degree of fatuity to the men who have been able to preside over and direct so considerable an organization, and who have raised it to its present really formidable proportions. However untempered by discretion the zeal of the Fenian masses may be, there are unquestionably cooler and clearer heads among the real leaders (who are not necessarily the ostensible ones) capable of calculating the adequacy of means to ends, and of viewing such an enterprise as the invasion of Ireland from the United States in a practical light.

But, if such an invasion is not really contemplated, what is the object of the great Fenian military organization in this country? This organization is very powerful. According to recent statements, it is far more numerous than the entire regular army of the United States. It possesses arsenals, and arms in abundance, and its members are about to be supplied with uniforms indicating their nationality and completing their conformity to the character of regular troops. One of the leaders in Ohio, telegraphs to headquarters in New York that he can "put 100,000 men into the field at short notice." In every large city, from New York to Chicago, the organization is complete. Its real numerical strength was not revealed or even indicated in the recent invasion of Canada, which is regarded by some suspicious observers of events as having been no more than a feint. Those who take this view of the matter argue, that after so much threatening talk, it became necessary to make a demonstration of some kind in order to keep up the enthusiasm of the masses of the order, and the influx of contributions to the treasury, and that "the movement on Canada was the result of the same popular impatience that produced the cry of "On to Richmond"—with this difference, that in the former case, there was no hope or expectation of success on the part of those who permitted the attempt.

But if the invasion of Ireland or the conquest of Canada is not the real object of the Fenians, it becomes an interesting investigation to inquire what that object is. On this subject some very startling and very absurd surmises have been hazarded by a certain class of alarmists who smell conspiracies and revolutions, gun powder plots and St. Bartholomew massacres, in whatever is clothed with the garb of mystery. But without adopting any of these sensational theories, it is quite obvious that in certain political contingencies which cannot be pronounced altogether out of the range of probability, it would be in the power of a great military body thoroughly organized, officered and equipped, spread all over the North, and bound together by the ties of nationality, discipline, and esprit du corps, to control the destinies of the country.

One week from Monday next, Congress will assemble. We do not yet know what attitude the President will assume toward it. The rumors on the subject are conflicting. Some of the matters which will come up for discussion are of the most exciting character; and should the threat of an impeachment be actually carried out, it is certain that partizan and sectional passions will be inflamed to such an extent as to render it impossible to forecast the results. Now if in this position of parties an open rupture between Congress and its supporters on the one side, and the President and his adherents on the other is to be taken into consideration as one of the possibilities of the political situation, it is easy to see how formidable is the power which such an organization as that of the Fenian Brotherhood could wield, if thrown as a unit into either scale. In fact, it is scarcely going too far to say, that in the present divided state of opinion at the North, and its unanimity at the South, the Fenians would, in the contingency suggested, be able, if controlled by a single will, to become the arbiters of the crisis.

AN ELECTIVE JUDICIARY.

WHEN the New York Constitutional Convention, some twenty years ago, introduced the system of an elective judiciary, chosen for comparatively short terms, the innovation was regarded with melancholy forebodings by many of the more thoughtful friends of free institutions. The reasons in favor of a permanent judiciary, and the objections to the elective system, were so strong and so obvious as to cause serious alarm in the minds of men of conservative ideas, and even to unsettle the faith of many in the durability of popular government. In the debates in the Convention, all the evils that have resulted from making the tenure of judicial position dependent upon a popular vote, repeated at brief intervals, were distinctly predicted. Furthermore, the belief was general that the change once made, it would be found impossible to take any backward step, or to retrieve the error, even should experience clearly demonstrate it to be such. It was supposed that the people would never consent to relinquish the power of choosing their judges, after having become accustomed to exercise it, no matter how cogent might be the reasons for returning to the old system. Now, however, the mischievous consequences of choosing judges for terms of four or six years, by a strictly partizan vote, and of making their official position dependent upon the fortunes of the party by which they were chosen, have become so apparent that a strong public feeling in favor of abandoning the existing system, and choosing judges for life, or during good behaviour, seems to be rapidly developing itself throughout the country. In the city of New York the plan of electing judges by a party vote for short terms has resulted in causing a position upon the bench to be regarded as a prize to be won by efficient party service, irrespective of qualification, and in clothing such demagogues as McCunn, Barnard and Cardozo, with a judicial authority which they have disgraced. If in San Francisco, we have hitherto escaped similar consequences, it is owing to peculiar local causes quite independent of the intrinsic merits of the system. The fact that the Press is beginning to speak out boldly on this subject, and to point out the evils and abuses that result from making a position on the bench a reward for party services, is a most encouraging sign of the times. If it shall be found that it is possible in a popular government to retrace a false step of this kind when experience has clearly proved it to be false—if the people shall show themselves capable of surrendering a power which they have become accustomed to exercise, in obedience to the dictates of reason, one of the most specious arguments against liberal institutions, and in favor of the monarchical or the aristocratic systems will have received a satisfactory and conclusive answer.

Hutching's Yo-Semite Almanac for 1867.—We have received from Mr. J. W. Hutchings, proprietor of the hotel in Yo-Semite Valley, a copy of this excellently illustrated and very handsomely printed pamphlet of sixty pages. It contains an outline map of the valley, with the positions of the waterfalls, and famous mountains surrounding it correctly located; and also some fifteen views, mostly of the scenery of the valley, and much interesting reading and statistical matter appertaining to California. It is for sale by all the news dealers throughout the State.

We have received from A. Roman & Co. a number of new publications which will receive due notice in our next issue. Among these, are Bulfinch's Oregon and El Dorado, or The Romance of the Rivers; Holmes' Authorship of Shakspeare, alluded to in "Literary Gleanings" on another page of to-day's Californian, and Donald G. Mitchell's novel of Doctor Johns, the publication of which, as a serial in the Atlantic Monthly, has just been completed.

The London Saturday Review says that the two great "morals" of Mr. Bowles' Across the Continent are: first, that the Pacific Railway is of the utmost importance to bind the Pacific to the Eastern States; second, that anybody who thinks of buying shares in a mining company in California had better think twice about it, and carefully meditate Gen. Freemont's saying—"When I came to California I was worth nothing, and now I owe two millions of dollars."

We ought no more to dispise a man for the misfortune of the mind, than for that of the body, when it is such as he cannot help. Were this thoroughly considered, we should no more laugh at one for having his brains cracked than for having his head broken.

The Anatomical Museum of this city, modeled after the similar institutions of New York, Paris and London, constitutes one of the greatest collection of scientific wonders in the world.

No enjoyment can be transitory; the impression which it leaves is permanent; and what is done with diligence and effort communicates a hidden force, of which we cannot say how far its influence may reach.

The Homeless Vicar.—The great head of the Catholic Church must leave Rome. All the kingdoms of the earth are exercised to decide upon what place is the most fitting to be the home of the descendant of St. Peter, and the keeper of the keys. A dispatch from Berlin, dated November 21st, states that there is a rumor that the King of Prussia has offered the Pope of Rome protection. Prussia would not prove a comfortable home for the Holy Father. Some persons are in favor of offering His Holiness an asylum in Ireland; the British Government might be persuaded to agree to this arrangement on condition that the Pope made the Irishmen all loyal to the temporal rule of England, and confined himself to filling the duties of a spiritual ruler. Enthusiastic Catholics in this country indulge in the wild dream of inviting the head of the Church to the United States. They revel in the fancy that the hierarchy, which during many centuries controlled the kingdoms of the Old World, may in the New World rise to equal greatness. These enthusiasts maintain that the world moves in a circle; that history repeats itself; that what has been will be again, and still will recur. The Catholic Church in America is striving to establish itself firmly in the Southern States, and hopes that some day the Pope may reign there a temporal and spiritual ruler. In the mean time each of the nations of Europe is offering the Pope of Rome an asylum. The Holy Catholic Church, which has for centuries exercised such a tremendous influence over the destiny of nations, is now supposed to be moribund—the Sultan of Turkey and the Pope of Rome are pronounced to be the two sick men of Europe.

It is by no means probable that the Pope of Rome—who is, by rabid Protestants, believed to be the veritable Anti-Christ—will fall this year, or that the magnificent structure known as the Church will fade away in a moment. In the event, however, of the necessity of establishing an "Asylum for Deposed Popes" arising, we would suggest that it be built in the City of Jerusalem. This is a city of no political importance; it was the birthplace of Christianity: it is out of the way; therefore let the Pope, if he must leave Rome, go to Jerusalem.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editors of The Californian cannot engage to furnish answers to interrogatories propounded in this department. They will be glad, however, to publish replies supplied by correspondents.]

WAS BUCKLE A MATERIALIST?

To the Editor of the Californian:

GENT: In an article in one of the daily papers last week, (I do not remember whether it was the Alta or the Times.) the author of the History of Civilization was alluded to as a materialist. Now I have been an earnest and enthusiastic student of his writings, and I have never seen any evidence in them to justify this classification of their author. He certainly believed in the existence of mind as distinct from matter, and also in the immortality of the soul, as he declares in an eloquent passage in one of his lectures. Can a man who holds these doctrines be properly characterized as a materialist? Upland.

Buckle's philosophical generalizations were of the materialistic stamp, and in one sense it would seem proper enough to class his principal writings as "materialistic," though some of his avowed opinions were inconsistent with materialism.

THE DARWINIAN THEORY AND THE AUTHOR OF "THE VESTIGES."

Messrs. Editors of the Californian:

Some weeks since, in reply to an inquiry from a correspondent as to the author of the Vestiges of Creation which produced such a sensation some twenty years ago, you stated that Richard Vivian was the author of that work. I should like to be informed of the grounds upon which you attribute the authorship of the book to the individual named. I am not aware that its authorship has ever been acknowledged by any one, or that the question had ever been settled. The book itself was the beginning of Darwinism, and the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, is little more than a development of the ideas set forth in the Vestiges. This being the case, why is it not the most reasonable conjecture to attribute the book to Darwin himself? He has never disclaimed it, so far as I am aware; nor has any one else ever acknowledged it. M. M.

To the Editor of the Californian:

Sir: I shall be much obliged if some one of your correspondents would be so kind as to supply me with the names and States of some of the attorneys who, on the breaking out of the late rebellion, left California and entered the Federal army, and rose to rank, and having survived the perils of campaign life, when this war ended returned to their profession of the bar, and entered and pleaded in the Law Courts of their several States as before, without any remarks or objection from the Judge, but as compliment on their prowress and successful surviving of perils and dangers they had encountered.

California Husbands.

WE do not believe that in any community on the face of the planet which we inhabit husbands are kept more thoroughly in hand by their wives than they are in the city of San Francisco. In the English papers we read horrible accounts of quarrels between husbands and wives eventuating in wives appearing with swollen noses, discolored eyes and fractured foreheads, to seek redress at the hands of the magistrates of the police courts. The English husband of the lower classes is too apt to use coercive measures with a disobedient and provoking wife. These coercive measures are sometimes repeated blows of the fist planted between the eyes, and occasionally a flat iron is brought to bear with considerable violence on the scull of the offending better half. Wife-whipping in California is now an unknown offense since the death of Reese Jenkins, who was a Welchman—and California husbands are, as a rule, the most docile and long suffering of the mules of the human species. Perhaps the facilities for obtaining a divorce afforded the Californian wife may enable her in a great measure to subjugate her husband. When a man has had a wife for a few years he hardly knows how to do without one. He has learned to be contented with beefsteak for dinner in place of the artistically cooked grouse, quail, snipe, and wonderfully prepared entrees with which he was accustomed to stimulate his appetite at Gumba's. He has a home. He has sacrificed his independence, but he has placed himself beyond the reach of many temptations attended with expense and bodily suffering. The wife may threaten the husband with an action for divorce on the grounds of extreme cruelty—he having neglected to provide her with a new bonnet when the one which she had was quite out of fashion—but he will not willingly get divorced from his wife—save for one cause, and will be very unwilling to prove such cause. After a husband has gone to all the expense and trouble of breaking in a wife he will put up with a great deal, and when he sees that his neighbors are docile and obey their wives, he will very soon forget that St. Paul said "Wives obey your husbands," or else think that St. Paul, being a bachelor—by all accounts—knew nothing at all about the matter, and think it better to submit to his wife in everything than to make a fuss about the matter and live in a continual state of discord. Whatever causes may conduce to this result, we maintain that there are more "model husbands" in California than in any other part of the world. The California husband walks in the dead of night with the baby in his arms when it is in the agonies of teething; he performs for his baby offices which an European husband would shrink from; he tastes his baby's pap before introducing the spoon between its infantile gums. More than all this, he will often, while his wife goes off to a ball with a particular friend of hers—and his, of course—stay at home and take care of the baby during the long hours that his wife mingles in the mazy etc. On Monday night we saw a beautiful specimen of the model California husband at Maguire's Opera House. His wife wished to see Hamlet; the baby had to be taken care of; the husband did not, we presume, fancy staying at home to take care of the baby, and consequently, relying on the aforesaid baby behaving itself well, accompanied his wife to the Opera House. Alas! his hopes of witnessing Hamlet were blighted. Just as "Hamlet" referred to "Polonius" as a "big baby scarce out of his swaddling clothes," the model husband's baby yelled, the audience roared with laughter, and the model husband was requested to take the baby outside. In the vestibule, painfully pacing too and fro, did that model husband nurse that fractious baby during four acts of Hamlet, while his wife sat in the dress circle enjoying the performance. He was the admired of all beholders. He was the type of a numerous class in California. He was a mild looking man with a face like a sheep, long and sad looking; his better half was a full muscular woman; when we saw her we wondered not at the submission of the husband she could easily have whipped him. We maintain, however, that, as a rule, California husbands are very submissive, and many, to avoid quarrelling with their wives, submit to a great deal too much.

Literary Men in California.

California is a very young country. It has, by the aid of the energy of its inhabitants, drawn from all the countries of the old world, pushed itself forward, and now claims an equal rank with the old States. The first settlers of this State were forced as a matter of course to cut down trees, build houses, dig gold, and perform other labors in which but little intellect was required. Muscle was more valued than brains. It is not comfortable to think that even now, when San Francisco has among her inhabitants men possessing millions, but little is being done for the encouragement of the literature of the State. The man who works with his brain is too often looked upon as a useless cumberer of the earth. A carpenter is a respectable man, a blacksmith is generally acknowledged to be useful, but "a man who writes for the papers"—"a Bohemian"—is looked upon as a rather disreputable character. If a man, even by cheating, lying, and stealing, obtains enough money to enable him to become "a newspaper proprietor," San Francisco society will acknowledge him as a worthy member. Often this smart person may build up a paper entirely on the brains of "Bohemians," being himself ignorant, coarse, and utterly uneducated. Even in this case the proprietor of the paper without brains is too apt to be thought more of than the men with brains who are the soul of the paper, the editing of which he imagines he superintends. Brains are too cheap in California, not because the market is glutted with the article, but for the reason that the demand is very slow. In California almost any one can write. Any person who has had the advantages of a common public school education, thinks, if he fails in book-keeping, he can at least write for the papers. Uneducated musicians, who fail in managing concerts, take advantage of the fact that they are aware that a minim is equal to two crotchets, and impose themselves on ignorant newspaper proprietors as "musical critics." The profession of literature in California is a disreputable one. A man who deals a fair game of Faro is more highly estimated than the finest poet, the most talented journalist, or the most witty writer in our midst. California is young at present, and has, perhaps, done as much for the encouragement of literature within its borders as any other State, but still it is not enough.

A Distinguished Lawyer in a Fix; or, the Navy vs. the Bar.

MR. EDITOR: There is a dainty morsel of gossip floating about in private circles, which, as it cannot be long kept from the public, I have concluded to dish up for the "Lion's Mouth," feeling sure that it will hugely tickle the beast's palate. It is a queer story, and has several morals to it, one of which seems to be that when the Navy and the Bar come into diplomatic collision, the latter can't, notwithstanding its acuteness, always reckon with confidence upon coming out ahead.

You will probably remember that among the applications for the editorial chair of THE CALIFORNIAN, published some month or two since, there was one from a rising and ambitious young lawyer and politician, who stated that the Athenian Pericles was the model upon which he was endeavoring to "form himself," and illustrated his ardor in the pursuit of popularity by declaring that he had become "a Mason and an Odd Fellow; a Sunday School Teacher and a 'Man of Society;' Grand Commander of the Temperance Legion and a Director of the Liquor Dealers' Association; President of the Mercantile Library, of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Ladies' Protection and Relief Society, the Protestant Orphan Asylum, and the Jockey Club, besides being Vice President, Director, or Trustee in seventeen other corporate bodies, including the Spring Valley Water Association, the Metropolitan Gas Company, the Nicholson Pavement Association, the New Idria Mining Company, together with seven Life and Fire Insurance Companies." Well, it is this aspiring and all-accomplished genius who is the hero, or rather one of the heroes of my story; Rear-Admiral H. K. Thatcher, in command of the Pacific Squadron, is the other.

But my preface has grown portentous; let me hasten to the res gesta as the lawyers say. Not long since, there was a great failure at Honolulu; among the principal creditors was a banking firm at San Francisco whose legal advisers were a firm of which our Pericles is a member. The Bankers were naturally anxious to take prompt measures to secure themselves as far as practicable, and to hurry off their attorney to the scene of action in advance of the representatives of other creditors. But some time must elapse before the sailing of any vessel for Honolulu, except the U. S. steamer Vanderbilt, carrying the flag of Admiral Thatcher, and she of course could not carry passengers. Nevertheless an attempt was made to obtain a passage on her for our Pericles, but in vain. Meantime a gentleman interested in the firm that had failed, and interested adversely to the Bankers, had proved more successful, through the influence of an officer of the Vanderbilt whose relative he was, and managed to secure permission to make the trip in the Vanderbilt. Our young hero, accidentally learned this move, and saw that it must be frustrated. He accordingly penned a smooth and highly diplomatic epistle to the honest Admiral, setting forth the facts relating to the business to be settled at the Islands, and the motives of the "other gentleman" in wishing to secure a passage on the Vanderbilt, and closing with a remonstrance against permitting a U. S. ship-of-war to be "used" for the purpose of enabling one of the parties to a business contest involving litigation to secure an advantage over the adverse party. The Admiral was convinced, and the result was that the gentleman who flattered himself that he was going down to the Islands in the "adverse interest" found himself disappointed. So far, the diplomacy of our astute Athenian was a brilliant success; but this did not suffice. His audacious genius planned a coup worthy of Louis Napoleon. He had effectually prevented the enemy from securing a berth on the Vanderbilt, and now be set to work to obtain a passage for himself. Representations were accordingly made to the captain of the flag-ship that a young man in delicate health was anxious to make the trip. The reply was, that the thing was impossible; no "passengers" could be taken. This had been anticipated; and then came the inquiry whether there was not some "position" which the "invalid" could take, by virtue of which he could be counted as one of the officers or attaches of the ship. The matter was urgently pressed, and at length it was arranged that the young man could go as "Captain's Clerk." The Vanderbilt sailed, and our accomplished Athenian sailed with her, in his "official capacity," his name appearing in the list of officers. Arrived at Honolulu, the "invalid" landed, and no sooner set foot on Hawaiian soil, than he was at once transformed from "Captain's clerk of the Vanderbilt," into an attorney and counseller at law, representing the interests of his San Francisco clients, the creditors of the insolvent Honolulu firm. By this time the bluff old Admiral had had his eyes opened to the fine diplomacy of the ambitious member of all the Associations, and his wrath was kindled. For five consecutive minutes he is said to have done some of the most original and picturesque swearing to be found on any log. Then another aspect of the case seemed to present itself to his mind, and he laughed long and heartily, declaring that "the young rascal would be sure to take the odd trick if he shuffled the cards with the devil himself. Then he got mad again, and swore that he would teach the impudent youngster that it wasn't so easy for a land-shark to get ahead of an old sea dog as he imagined. Then he smoked a pipe and cogitated. Then he retired to his cabin, had a brief interview with his Captain, the result of which was that the latter penned a brief note addressed to his "clerk." The note was immediately dispatched ashore, and found the "clerk" up to his eyes in law papers. Imagine his astonishment when he read as follows:

"SIR:—You will please report yourself at once on board the Vanderbilt, your official services being pressingly required.

Yours respectfully, ——

P. S.—The Admiral will not permit me to accept your resignation as Captain's clerk, until the cruise is completed. We sail for Panama and Valparaiso in a few days, and I think you will have to accompany us. The Admiral is quite resolved about this, and I do not know what measure he will not resort to in order to compel you to fulfil the implied contract which you entered into when you assumed the position of Captain's clerk. I am not sure that you could not be treated as a deserter in case you should fail to report on board. The matter is much more serious than you may be aware, and you should not let any considerations of mere convenience control your action."

How our American Pericles replied to this communication, and whether he obeyed the summons, or took the risk of incurring the penalties of desertion, remains to be ascertained. My own opinion, however, is, that he is by this time on his way to Valparaiso, and that his San Francisco clients need not expect to see him again for six months or a year to come. CAPTAIN JAGGERS.

A Lunar (Lunatic) Lyric.

One Lewis Gridley is said to have translated Poe's "Raven" into Latin, in a measure which is agreeably described as being "a five line stanza of trochaic tetrameter, with a trochaic dimiter-hypercatalectic." That version of "the Raven," may be imposing, but we doubt if it is more so than the following by Festus Bailey's spirit, delivered at a recent seance through Ada Hoyt Foio as a medium:

THE MOON-WORLD.

How evanescent and marine
Are thy chaotic uplands seen;
O, ever sublapsarian moon,
A thousand caravans of light
Were not so spherically bright,
Nor ventilated half so soon.
Metho't I stood upon a cone
Of solid Allopathic stone,
And gazed athwart the dreamy skies,
When lo! from yonder plani-sphere
A rapid atrobilions tear
Was dropped by pantommic eyes.
"Adieu, miasma!" cries a voice
In which a gorgon might rejoice,
So perifocal were its tones.
"Adieu, miasma! think of me
When on the antimonial sea,
Which covers my pellucid bones."
Again! again! my bark is tossed
Upon the raging holocaust
Of that acidulated sea.
And diapasons pouring down,
And lunar caustic joined to drown
My trauscendental epopee!

Mr. Jefferson Snort on Fenianism.

MESSRS. EDITORS—GENTS. I am amazed at the apathy of my countrymen in regard to the danger with which they are threatened by that great Irish organization known as the Fenian Brotherhood. I am still more amazed at their dullness—their incredible stupidity and blindness, in not suspecting the real aims of this formidable organization. Can any intelligent man be so infatuated as to imagine that the men who are at the bottom of Fenianism, and in its secrets, seriously contemplate the invasion of Ireland or the conquest of Canada? I solemnly assure you that they contemplate nothing of the kind, though they may amuse their thoughtless dupes with that illusory idea. No, gentlemen! Their object is to make themselves masters of the political situation in the United States. Already they number half a million of men armed and equipped. Already the men who control the movement consider that their object is within their grasp. Gentlemen, I am not an alarmist, nor a visionary, but I tell you that the real Fenian leaders care far more for the United States than for Ireland; that the pretended opposition of the church dignitaries to Fenianism is all a blind; that the object of the true founders of the order is to secure Catholic ascendancy in these United States; and that unless Americans begin to bestir themselves they will, in less than two years, see the Pope occupying the White House, and Romanism the established religion of the country. Yours Solemnly, JEFFERSON SNORT.

Aerial Navigation.

The "paid poet" of the "Aerial Steam Navigation Company," intimates in his last "lyric" that the "launch of the Avitor" is to come off early in December next, from the top of Rincon Hill. The official bard thus commences his prophetic description of the great event:

"The morning is all sunshine, the wind is blowing fair,
The Avitor's about to start, and all thy town is there;
A moment and you'll see her launched—nay, doubt it an ye will,
Scarce ten have faith of all the crowd that covers Rincon Hill."

The "unbelievers," however, are soon destined to be brought under conviction:"

"And now the signal gun is heard, and the stout engineer
Touches a valve, and turns a crank, and the steam it whistles cleur.
O the morning is all sunshine, and the wind is blowing fair,
And like an arrow from a bow, shoots into the air!

"The women shriek; loud shout the men; the boys sing out hi! hi!
And some turn pale, and some grow faint, as they gaze up to the sky,
'Tis true! 'tis real! 'tis no dream! Ye gods, how can it be?
And yet a man can't but believe the things his eyes do see!"

The following is quite graphic, though certainly the stanzas alluding to Bishop Kip and Doctor Scudder are not in unexceptionable taste, and indeed savor of irreverence:

"They crowd the windows, and the roofs, and balconies to gaze
At this astounding spectacle in wonder and amaze,
And yonder on his portico, to view the airy trip,
Behold, the tall and lordly form of courtly Bishop Kip.

"He stands and waves his handkerchief—a Duchess gift, I ween,
And taps a jeweled snuff-box thrice—the gift of England's Queen,
And says: 'They've naught in Europe like yonder strange machine—
In all my travels never yet its equal have I seen.'

"And yonder, spectacles on nose, the solemn Scudder stands,
With rolling eyes and gaping mouth and high uplifted hands;
'Heaven's fiery chariot!' he exclaims, 'that did Elijah bear!
Brethren, 'tis an amazing sight! let us unite in prayer.'

"Whiz, fiz, puff, snort! the engine goes; and like an aerolite,
Swift shooting through the arch of heaven, the car is out of sight.
Whiz, fiz puff, snort, o'er field and flood, and ere the set of sun,
Her screaming whistle echoes through the streets of Washington."

We don't know but that an apology is due our readers for quoting the last but one, of these stanzas; but the fact is, our Lion is especially voracious this week, and therefore less fastidious than usual in regard to his provender. Meantime, the 2nd of December will be impatiently awaited by Mr. Center and the other capitalists who have taken stock in the Avitor.

The "Times" Imbroglio.

It is currently reported that there has been intestine trouble in the Times establishment, and that Mr. McClatchey has been removed from the position of managing editor. The Dramatic Chronicle thus comments upon the circumstance:

"By getting rid of the most competent man connected with the concern, the Trustees have proved their own incompetency. They knew enough to know that something was wrong about the concern, but not enough to know what; and so acted upon the example of a stupified and bewildered cabinet, that thinks the only thing to be done after a defeat, is to remove the Commanding General."

The fact is, that a newspaper, like an army, needs a head; and we don't believe that any journalistic institution managed by a "Board of Directors" ever did succeed, or ever will succeed.

WITHOUT grand words, how many persons would say little things.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A LIVELY SUBJECT.

THERE used to be a story current of a perplexing incident in the life of John Hunter, the celebrated surgeon, which has a certain grim drollery about it. One night on receiving from Jack Ketch a "subject, who had been hanged that morning at Newgate—such hangings and such sellings were common in those days—he perceived that somehow or other the vital spark was not quite extinct. His professional zeal was instantly aroused; he applied all his skill to the task and in a short time succeeded, to his scientific satisfaction, in restoring the law's victim to his full faculties again. But his satisfaction was somewhat short-lived, for the resuscitated felon insisted upon looking to his benefactor for his future subsistence! He argued that, as he had striven to bring him, as it were, a second time into the world, he must be regarded in loco parentis! Hunter, always a nervous man, and, by no means convinced that he had not offended grievously against the laws in his little experiment, had no alternatives but to comply with the demands, of his ungrateful patient, who was by no means modest in his visits. After a time, however, they ceased; but even that brought no comfort to poor Hunter, who lived in perpetual terror of his tormentor unexpectedly popping upon him. At last he reappeared before him again. One fine evening another Newgate importatiou was brought to the private door of the dissecting-room, and to his intense satisfaction, he once more recognized the well-remembered features! Hunter used to say, with a grim smile, that he took speedy care not to give him a second chance.

THE SAGACITY OF ANTS.—Having a mind to try the sagacity of these little animals, I stopped the holes through which they went for provisions in a neighboring granary, and thereby obliged them to long and tedious journeys in order to supply their stores. At last I spread several handsful of wheat in a room which adjoined their abode; but I still found the ants continued going over several gardens and other large tracts of ground to find out provisions, and constantly brought them home to the same place, which plainly showed they had not yet discovered the supply I had intended for them. At last I caught one of the ants, and threw her on the wheat I had spread; the insect having been frightened, and finding herself at liberty, ran away without laying hold of that opportunity to eurich herself; but, about, three, or four minutes afterwards, I was agreeably surprised to see five or six hundred of those little animals marching towards the heap of wheat, who all took their loading and then returned home.

FLOWERS FOR WINTER.—Now is the time to provide for that greatest ornament for your sitting-room—a bouquet of flowers; this when all is bleak and wintry without. Take the latest buds, just as they are about to open; cut them, leaving the stems about three inches long; cover each end of each stem with melted sealing-wax, when the buds begin to wither, wrap them separately in paper, and place them in a dry box. In the dead of the winter, when you wish to have the buds blossom, you need only to cut off their sealed ends, and put them into water, in which a little saltpetre has been dissolved.

"ONE OF THE BOYS."—A youngster came home after having a glorious time in the puddles, his face all aglow, and his rubber boots full of water. The punishment of staying in the house for the remainder of the day did not seem very hard at first; but as his little heart warmed up with the recollection of the triumph of the morning, when he had waded deeper than any of his playmates dared to, he could bear the restraint no longer, and went to his mother, saying: "Please mother, whip me and let me go out again!"

COUNT D'ORSAY, Eugene Sue, and most of their associates composing the roll of the "young men of 1830," in France, have all been mowed down in the meridian of their intellectual fame, by coffee, wine, and licentiousness.

How Shall we Wear Our Hair?—Something must be done, and that quickly, or we shall have all our ladyships scudding under bare poles. The mandates of fashion have been over severe for three or four years, and now we are paying the penelty of our devotion. Eugenie's hair is getting thin on the top of her head! Well, she has plenty of company in that affliction, if that is any comfort to her. The waterfalls, cataracts, rats, mice and the thousand other diabolical contrivances of hair dresses, have all tended to one object—to strain at the roots of the hair by tying and twisting in every possible way. The natural consequence is the downfall of the glory of woman. What shall we do? Go back to the fashions of shepherd simplicity, and wear our own ringlets over our shoulders? Alas! for us who have locks like unto the needless of the pine tree, and whose tresses have as much spiral tendency as the most rigid of pokers! Who will come to our relief, for the waterfall oppresseth the brain, and headaches are prevalent among us? Let some hair-dresser arise who will free us from this bondage, and great will be his reward.

Ladies Learning Bad Habits.—The fairer and better portion of humanity are quite manly enough in their style of dress, without imitating the vile habits of the sterner sex. We are sorry to see in a foreign exchange that the practice of smoking is getting to be quite "the thing" among the leading London ladies. The Court Journal says:—"Smoke seems to be increasing in the metropolis, not from coal but tobacco. We have lately seen several very flagrant uses of the weed in London by females. A lady, whose name was known to us, and for whom we would vouch in all things, save the smoke, we espied, recently, through the draw blinds of her carriage, having a few whiffs from her cigarette on the sly. A long draw, and down went the cigarète by the side, while the smoker leaned back and revelled in the smoke slowly emitted. But the worst fact remains to be told; that the cigarette frequently contains a strongly opium-steeped tobacco, and hence, rather than from the love of the pure weed, arises the gratification of ces games who take to smoking."

A Simple Antidote for Poisons.—A plain farmer says: "It is now more than twenty years since I learned that sweet oil would cure the bite of a rattlesnake, not knowing it would cure other kinds of poison of any kind, both on man and beast, The patient must take a spoonful of it internally, and bathe the wound for a cure. To cure a horse it requires eight times as much as it does for a man. Here let me tell of one of the most extreme cases of snake bites; eleven years ago this summer, where the case had been thirty days standing, and the patient had been given up by his physicians, I heard of it, carried the oil and gave him one spoonful, which effected a cure. It is an antidote for arsenic and strychnine, it will cure the sting of bees, spiders or other insects, and will cure persons who have been poisoned by a low running vine, growing in the meadows, called ivy."

A FAST STORY.

An ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman; "they have to commence ringing about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound, the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-grown head of hair and teeth in their mouths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', also, Mechanical Toys, that run by themselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"Indeed! is that so? Who is the firm that have the Dolls saying 'Mamma'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasing? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

A DISINFECTANT.

AN eastern editor was presented, during the hot weather, with a sample of a "deodorizer and cholera disinfectant," with a request to notice it. He says he noticed it as soon as he smelt it, and thus relates the sequel:

Didn't wish to terrify the family by the ostentatious display of cholera precautions of an extraordinary nature, so we took our patent deodorizer home secretly, concealed under our coat. Terrible commotion in the street-car. The windows were thrown up hastily, handkerchiefs applied furiously to noses, and a general application of camphor gum, of which each one had a supply in his pocket. Profane fellows swore at the Board of Health for not cleaning the streets. One was sure it was in the gutters: another thought it was in the air; a toper, half drunk, said he was satisfied "it was in the (hic) water."

"I'll tell you what it's in," said a gloomy man, eyeing us suspiciously.

"What?" the passengers shrieked, with one voice:

"It's in the car!"

With a wide yell, they jumped up at once and tumbled out, leaving us all alone, and monarch of all we deodorized.

Got into the house unperceived, and deposited the disinfectant in the cellar, and then hurried back to the office. There was a good deal of it about our clothes, so much so that one or two men who owed us borrowed money avoided us altogether. Felt emotions in the region of the stomach, that were disagreeably suggestive. Got a little alarmed, and concluded to deodorize the disinfectant, which we did with a glass of brandy. Felt a little better ourself, but began to feel alarmed about the effect of that disinfecting compound upon the family. Hurried home—found the house shut up, and nobody in. Terrible smell about the house—neighbors all terrified. Asked one of them where my family was, and he said they had gone down to the bone-boiling district, to get out of the smell!

Opened the door, but had to close it again, the smell was so bad. Went around to the back yard, and saw the rats leaving in great precipitation. A neighbor suggested that a candle be lowered down the chimney, to test the foulness of the air before the house was opened. Saloons in the neighborhood doing an immense business in the sale of brandy and whisky. Flaunel belts in demand. A country-woman with a load of watermelons mobbed and driven back. Arrival of a police officer, who arrested us for keeping a nuisance on our premises. Explanations made, and we are paroled until the house can be opened. Burnt some pitch on the front doorstep, and were then enabled to get to throw up the windows. Whew! neighbors said they preferred cholera. The disiufectant is nearly abolished now, and family back again, enjoing their usual health. They say they don't wish to be disinfected any more.

In one building in Pittsburg a democratic newspaper occupies the third-story, and a republican paper the fourth. On the occasion of the grand procession there, the Johnson paper hung from its window a strip of canvas labelled "Johnson and Clymer." The Union paper immediately had another strip printed in the same style with the words, "Brave men detest." and hung the inscription from the window just above; and the sentence formed by the combination of the two was highly edifying to spectators of both parties.

THE HEIGHT OF LAZINESS.—Various instances have been cited to prove how lazy a man can be and live, but it remains for a Michigander to cap the climax. One hot day during the heated term last summer, one Mr. F—, of Jackson county, was observed to throw himself down on the grass under the spreading branches of a shade tree, and exclaim, emphatically, to himself, "There, breathe if you want to—I shan't!"

If young men peep into a milliner's shop it is a clear proof that they are troubling themselves about things that do not concern them.

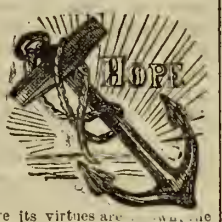
FOR THE RAPID CURE OF

COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA, HOARSENESS, CROUP, BRONCHITIS, INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION, AND FOR THE RELIEF OF CONSUMPTIVE PATIENTS IN ADVANCED STAGES OF THE DISEASE.



SO wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous are the cases of its cures, that almost every section of country abounds in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other Expectorant is too apparent to escape observation and where its virtues are [illegible], the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs that are incident to our climate. While many inferior remedies thrust upon the community have failed and been discarded, this having gained friends by every trial, conferred benefits on the afflicted they can never forget, and produced cures too numerous and too remarkable to be forgotten.

We can only assure the public, that its quality is carefully kept up to the best it ever has been, and that it may be relied on to do for their relief all that it has ever done.

Great numbers of clergymen, Physicians, Statesmen, and eminent personages, have lent their names to certify the unparalleled usefulness of our remedies, but space here will not permit the insertion of them. The Agents below named furnish gratis our AMERICAN ALMANAC in which they are given; with also full descriptions of the complaints they cure.

Those who require an alterative medicine to purify the blood will find AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA the remedy to use. Try it once, and you will know its value.

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

MY RATTER—NIP.

I WAS so fortunate as to secure, from a boy in the market, a fine old-line, bob-tailed rat, whose furious efforts to chaw everything within reach gave promise of glorious sport for Nip. Took the rat home, called my dog, and told my wife that if she wanted to see the way terriers did rats, to come down in the basement. She came down and shut the door—just in time, too; for as soon as Nip saw the rat, he, Nip, my ratter, for which I paid the sporting gent five dollars, made most unmistaklably cowardly movements toward the door. Wife on a chair, said the dog did not appear to see the rat. Told wife to keep her breath, she knew nothing about terriers. Tho't I would not give Nip any reason for not seeing the rat again, so I tied the string that held the rat to the dog's hind leg. He saw the rat that time, and jumped ou the chair by my wife. Wife laughed and shoved him off. Tried the stove next. Got off the stove without being shoved. The rat, however, being an old stager, and not being used to such treatment, made a demonstration on Nip's rear; and I don't believe little "Flora Temple" ever made better time in the same limits than that dog and rat made around the room.

First heat, dog had the lead, closely followed by rat, who, on striking the half-mile (footstool in the corner,) broke badly—in fact, nearly broke his back; and before he could be brought down (he was sliding on his back,) dog led him in by whole length of string. On the second heat, got off well to-gether (tied,) and went finely around, neck and tail, until they reached the judge's stand (wife standing on a chair,) against which dog brought up solid, bringing the judge down iu a style pre-eminently sudden, if not dignified. The heat was decidedly against the dog, you bet, and it was only after much persuasion that the judge would again take the stand.

The third heat may be termed dead heat. They got off as well apart as the dog conveniently could, and traveled lively until just as they struck the last quarter, when the rat, which ran about as well on his back as his legs, shied the track and got rather queerly around a table leg. Dog went on as far as the string and the length of the hind leg would let him. On raising the rat, he was found to be non compos—totally defunct—in fact, dead. Nip was not much better off.

Wife said the dog wouldn't kill rats. Told her that he had certainly killed that rat. But on viewing the feat in a scientific light, didn't feel satisfied with the performance; and the next morning gave him away to a milk-man, who wanted a ratter, to free his stable from the depredations of the vermin. I have not beeu able to ascertain which left him first, the rats or the dog.

FORTITUDE.—Let man regard this world merely as a preparatory stage to a future and eternal state of existence. Let him consider his misfortunes, sufferings, aud miseries as intended to prepare him the better for a world of undying glory and happiness; let him persevere in a course of virtue and usefulness, in contempt of the malignity of his enemies and the storms of adversity that beat around him, and he will infallibly attain to that perfection and happiness hereafter, which should constitute the only true end and aim of all human exertion and pursuit.

"DEAR me," said Mrs. Spriggins, "I don't know what to do with John, he is so cross to me."

"O, treat him kindly," replied Mrs. Brown; "always say, 'How are you, John, to-night? Can I do anything for you?' and so forth, and it will subdue him—it will be like heaping coals of fire on his head."

"Well," said Mrs. Spriggins, "I don't believe 'twill answer; I've tried boiling water, and that did no good,"

"WHO made the world?" asked a teacher of a little boy who had not been long in school. The boy shook his head and said nothing. The teacher threatened to whip him unless he answered. The boy, feeling impelled to a confession of some sort, broke forth, "Well, master, I made it, but I'll never do it again!"

THE FISHERMAN.

A FISHERMAN went out on the sea,
And toiled for his harvest there;
And he sang gay songs on the throbbing main,
All free from pain or care.

But the winds are fickle and the seas are false,
And fish that are swift and free
Were watching the fisherman there above
That was waiting on the sea.

And his boat went down with nets and lines,
For a mighty storm came out,
And the fisherman like a floating weed
Went floating slow about.

The fish took his flesh, the sea his bones,
The Lord his spirit away,
But the winds and waves and earthly things
Went heedless upon their way.

For the life of man is a transcient thing,
And his flesh is changing dust;
But his soul shall mount on immortal wings,
And hath a heavenly trust.

And the dead man's wife on the briny sands,
Went weeping to and fro,
But the heart of woman is soon appeased
As the sea or winds that blow.

The fisherman's bones went drifting round,
And the fish still swift and free,
Awaited there to catch, or be caught
By a fisherman on the sea. ****

CORRESPONDENCE.

[THE EDITORS of THE CALIFORNIAN cannot engage to furnish answers to interrogatories propounded in this department. They will be glad, however, to publish replies supplied by correspondents.]

THE "VESTIGES" AGAIN.

To the Editor of the Californian:

DEAR SIR:—In reply to one of your correspondents who inquires "upon what grounds" the authorship of the "Vestiges of Creation" is attributed to Richard Vivian, and suggests that Mr. Darwin, himself, is more probably the author, permit me to say that it has long been the unquestioned belief among literary men, curious in this matter, that Mr. Vivian was the real author of the work. It has been over and over again attributed to him in the English papers and periodicals, and he has never denied it. As to Mr. Darwin's being the author of the "Vestiges," the suggestion is a very wild one.

No two styles can well be more unlike than those of the "Vestiges" and "The Origin of Species." Mr. Darwin's style is simple and unornamented almost to boldness, while that of the author of the "Vestiges" has a certain rhetorical stateliness, and often rises into eloquence. Besides, since Mr. Darwin avows himself the author of the "Origin of Species," which is a development of the doctrine of the "Vestiges," why should he not also avow the latter work if it is his? He would thus be entitled to the credit of originating the idea he has ably elaborated, and avoid the imputation of having built upon another man's foundation. The time is past, and probably forever, when a writer on scientific subjects has any odium to encounter for pursuing investigations like those referred to, or for announcing any conclusions which facts and sound reasoning may seem to justify. In this respect there has been an amazing and happy change since the time when the "Vestiges" was published. It is scarcely twenty years, yet the progress of enlarged ideas has been such that no philosopher need at this day shrink from avowing himself the author of such books as either of the two in question.

Very respectfully, S. A. LUCAS.

THE BACON THEORY.

To the Editor of the Californian:

I see that some of the papers attribute to Miss Delia Bacon of Connecticut, the origination of the theory that Francis Bacon was the author of the plays ordinarily supposed to have been written by William Shakspeare. Indeed, I understand you to intimate as much in the following sentence from the "Literary Gleanings and Gossip," in the last number of THE CALIFORNIAN:

"It is said that Mr. Holmes' attention was first drawn to the subject of the present volume by an article in Putnam's Magazine, by Miss Delia Bacon, published many years ago. Miss Bacon not only maintained that the plays were written by Lord Bacon, but, also, that they had an esoteric political significance, to which she afterwards undertook to furnish a key in a bulky volume, the title of which we cannot at this moment recall."

What I wish to ask is, was not this idea long ago suggested by Schlegel, or Lessing, or some other German critic?

Respectfully, H. H.

We did not mean to intimate that the theory in question was originated by Miss Bacon, and our language as quoted, admits of no such interpretation. The idea is an old one, first suggested we think by some French or German critic, but certainly not by either the Schlegels or Lessing.

IS STORY, THE SCULPTOR, AN ENGLISHMAN?

To the Editor of the Californian:

Is there any foundation for the statement that W. W. Story, the sculptor, and the author of the very remarkable poem published in your last number, is an Englishma? I had always supposed him to be the son of the celebrated Chief Justice Story of Massachusetts, but within a few days past I have heard it asserted, with the utmost positiveness at one of the clubs in this city, that W. W. Story, the artist, is an Englishman. Respectfully, T. W. F.

Mr. W. W. Story is an American by birth, and, as our correspondent supposed, the son of the great American jurist; but he has renounced his allegiance to his native country, and become a subject of her Majesty, Queen Victoria. The reasons which induced him to take this step are not known—at least to us.

NEW STYLE OF BUILDING IN PARIS.—La Partrie has the following: "There is at this time in course of construction, as an experiment and possible model, in the Quartier de Roule, a house having nine stories above the ground floor, and with basement and cellars, altogether eleven stories. As land in the centre of Paris is of great value, and consequently rents very high, the object of the building is to obtain increased space by means of increased elevation. The house will have this peculiarity; it will have no staircase, but it will be provided with an hydraulic apparatus similar to that in use by builders to raise their materials to upper scaffolds. This apparatus consists of two large flat forms, ascending every minute, without making any noise. Upon these platforms will be placed seats, so that the lodgers in the house will be enabled to reach the highest stories without any fatigue. From this arrangement it would follow that the upper stories, being the most airy, commanding the best views, and being free from all risk of inconvenience from lodgers above, will probably obtain higher rent than the other apartments. Thus an entire revolution in house arrangements will be effected."

PROFUNDITY.—Profundity of thought is generally purchased at the expense of versatility. To be very profound, it is necessary that the intellectual eye be fixed, for a long time, on one continuous series of operations; to be versatile, the mind must glance from subject to subject, and brood over none. Profundity plunges to the depth, while versatility skims the surface of the sea of speculation; while the former is going down, the latter is sporting onward on easy wing.

DANGERS OF THE SEA.—Over one hundred vessels of various descriptions have been wrecked and disabled by the recent storms on the Atlantic, and at least five hundred people who were in them have found a watery grave. Even in these days of maritime skill and of powerful vessels, the elements sometimes gain the mastery.

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, an only son and spendthrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and forty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amherst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post-mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London. In London, at the house of Stewart Routh, a gentlemanly gambler and adventurer of good accomplishments and address, the reader is introduced to his wife Harriet, commonly addressed by Routh as "Harry,"—a woman of rare mental qualifications and quick appreciation, thoroughly devoted to her husband, his counselor in all his schemes, and a most efficient aid in his precarious mode of living.

One Deane, an American, a cool, sharp, "posted" man, with abundant means, is also introduced, whose cleverness is even too much for the designs of Routh and his wife. George Dallas receives a letter from his mother, who writes him that the one hundred and forty pounds, obtained by a great risk and almost criminal sacrifice, will be given to him by her in person at Amherst. He informs Routh of the import of his mother's letter. Routh, meanwhile, is organizing a company for working some newly discovered silver mines in Brazil, which promises to be "a big thing," but is badly in want of funds to successfully launch his scheme; when he learns from Deane that he is to receive for some stock transaction three thousand pounds, which sum Deane proposes to keep in his desk for a few days until wanted; and, in celebration of the event, he invites Routh and Dallas to dine with him at a fashionable restaurant on the same evening. Routh tells his wife that he must have Deane's money "one way or another." The dinner comes off, but Routh is not present.

George Dallas again visits Amherst under his author-name of "Paul Ward," to receive from his mother the money she promised him; when he learns from her lips that she has secretly sent her diamonds to Paris to be imitated, with the object of pledging the genuine ones as the only available means of obtaining the amount. The jewelry failing to arrive, his mother requests him to stop at Amherst for a few days to await its arrival. While sketching a private park, "The Sycamores," a chance acquaintance is brought about—which rapidly ripens into mutual though unavowed feelings of affection between Miss Clare Carruthers, a beautiful young lady of nineteen, the favorite niece and heir of the rich Capel Carruthers—Dallas' father-in-law—and our hero; known only to Miss Carruthers as "Paul Ward," the author.

AMONG THE BEECHES.

IN the afternoon of the day which had witnessed her second interview with the young man whom she knew as Paul Ward, and with whom her girlish fancy was delightfully busy, Clare Carruthers arrived at Poynings. She received an affectionate greeting from Mrs. Carruthers, inquired for her uncle, learned that no communication had been received from him that day, and therefore his wife concluded that his original arrangement to return on the following Tuesday morning remained unaltered; and then went off to see that "Sir Lancelot," who had been brought home from the Sycamores by a groom, was well cared for. Somehow, the beautiful animal had a deeper interest than ever for his young mistress. She touched his silken mane with a lighter, more lingering touch; she talked to him with a softer voice.

"He did not forget to mention you," she whispered to the intelligent creature, as she held his small muzzle in one hand and stroked his face with the other. "I wonder, I wonder, shall we ever see him again."

When the two ladies were together in the drawing room that evening, and the lamps were lighted, cheerful fires burning brightly in the two grates, which were none too many for the proportions of the noble room, the scene presented was one which would have suggested a confidential, cozy chat to the uninitiated male observer. But there was no chat and no confidence there that evening. Ordinarily, Mrs. Carruthers and Clare "got on" together very nicely, and were as thorough friends as the difference in their respective ages and the trouble in the elder lady's life, hidden from the younger, would permit. But each was a woman of naturally independent mind, and their companionship did not constrain either. Therefore the one sat down at a writing-table, and the other at the piano, without either feeling that the other expected to be talked to. Had not Mrs. Carruthers' preoccupation, her absorption in the hopes and fears which were all inspired by her son, so engrossed her attention, that she could not have observed anything not specially impressed upon her notice, she would have seen that Clare was more silent than usual, that her manner was absent, and that she had a little the air of making music an excuse for thought. The leaves of her music-book were not turned, and her fingers strayed over the keys, in old melodies played almost unconsciously, or paused for many minutes of unbroken silence. She had not mentioned the incidents of the last two days to Carruthers, not that she intended to leave them finally unspoken of, but that some undefined feeling prompted her to think them over first—so she explained her reticence to herself.

While Clare played, Mrs. Carruthers wrote, and the girl, glancing towards her sometimes, saw that her face wore an expression of painful and intense thought. She wrote rapidly, and evidently at great length, covering sheet after sheet of foreign letter-paper with bold firm characters, and once Clare remarked that she took a memorandum-book, out of her pocket and consulted it. As she replaced the book, a slip of paper fluttered from between the leaves and fell to the ground, unobserved either by herself or Clare. Shortly afterwards Mrs. Carruthers rose, collected her papers into a loose heap upon the table, and left the room, still with the same preoccupied expression on her face. Clare went on playing for a few moments, then, finding Mrs. Carruthers did not return, she yielded to the sense of freedom inspired by finding herself alone, and, leaving the piano, went over to one of the fireplaces and stood by the low mantelpiece, lost in thought. Several minutes passed away as she stood thus, then she roused herself, and was about to return to the piano, when her attention was attracted to a small slip of paper which lay on the floor near the writing-table. She picked it up, and saw written upon it two words only, but words which caused her an indescribable thrill of surprise. They were PAUL WARD.

"Mrs. Carruthers dropped this paper," said Clare to herself, "and he wrote the name. I know his hand, I saw it in the book he took the sketch in. Who is he? How does she know him? I wish she would return. I must ask her." But then, in the midst of her eagerness, Clare remembered a certain air of mystery about her chance acquaintance; she recalled the tone in which he had said, "That is my secret," the hints he had let fall that there existed something which time must clear up. She remembered, too, that he had not betrayed any acquaintance with Mrs Carruthers, had not even looked like it when she had mentioned Poynings and her uncle (and Clare had a curiously distinct recollection of Mr. Paul Ward's looks;) finally she thought how—surely she might be said to know, so strongly and reasonably did she suspect—that there were trials and experiences in Mrs. Carruthers' life to which she held no clue, and perhaps this strange circumstance might be connected with them.

"It is his secret and hers, if she knows him," the girl thought, "and I shall best be true and loyal to them both by asking nothing, by seeking to know nothing, until I am told." And here a sudden thrill of joy, joy so pure and vivid that it should have made her understand her own feelings without further investigation, shot through the girl's heart as she thought:

"If she knows him, my chance of seeing him again is much greater. In time I must come to understand it all."

So Clare allowed the paper to fall from her hands upon the carpet whence she had taken it, and when Mrs. Carruthers reentered the room bringing a packet of letters which she had gone to seek, Clare had resumed her place at the piano.

CHAPTER IX.

TIDED OVER.

IT was the fourth morning after George Dallas' arrival in Amherst, the day on which his mother had appointed by letter for him to go over to Poynings and there receive that which was to set him free from the incubus of debt and difficulty which had so long oppressed him. On going to the window and looking out, he found that nature and he were once again in accord. Spring was ripening into summer. Into the clean and comely little town, came wafted delicious odors from outlying gardens and uplands, where the tossing grass went waving to and fro like the undulations of a restless sea, and in the midst of which the sturdy old farm-houses, dotted here and there, stood out like red-faced islands.

The sunshine and the general brightness of the day had its due effect on George Dallas, who was young, for a nineteenth-century man, almost romantic, and certainly impressible. His spirits rose within him, as, his breakfast finished, he started off to walk to Poynings. Drinking in the loveliness of the broad sun-steeped landscape, the sweet odors coming towards him on the soft breeze, the pleasant sound, were it chink of blacksmith's hammer, or hum of bees, or voice of cuckoo hidden deep in distant bright-leaved woods, the young man for a time forgot his baser associations and seemed to rise, in the surroundings of the moment, to a better and purer frame of mind than he had known for many years. Natural, under such circumstances, was the first turning of his thoughts to his mother, to whose deep love and self sacrifice he was indebted for the freedom which at length was about to be his. In his worst times there had been one bright spot of her in all the black folly of his life, and now the recollection of her disinterestedness and long suffering on his behalf made her as purely dear to him as when, in the old days that seemed so long ago, he had said his prayers at her knee. He recollected walking with her in their garden on mornings like these, when they were all in all to each other, soon after his father's death, when that chastening memory was on them both, and before there was any thought of Mr. Carruthers or his niece—or his niece!—and straightway off went his thoughts into a different channel. What a pretty girl! so soft and quiet, so fresh withal, and frank, and guileless, so different to—Well, he didn't know; with similar advantages Harriet might have been very much the same. But Miss Carruthers was certainly specially charming.

Busy with these thoughts, and ever and anon pausing to look round him at the fair scenes through which he was passing, George Dallas pursued his way along the high road until he gained the summit of the little hill whence is obtained the first view of Poynings and its grounds. There he stopped suddenly at seeing a carriage driving through the open lodge gates, and in the carriage reclining at his ease no less a person than Mr. Cadel Carruthers. It was he, not a doubt about it, in the respectability of his glossy broad-brimmed hat, in his white whiskers, in his close-fitting dog-skin gloves, in the very double-gold eyegluss with which he was looking at nature in a very patronizing manner. Even if he had not been short-sighted, Mr. Carruthers was at such a distance as would have utterly prevented him from recognizing any one on the top of the hill; but George Dallas no sooner saw him than instinctively he crouched down by the hedge-side and waited until the carriage was rolling down the avenue; then he slowly raised himself muttering:

"What the deuce has brought him back just now? confound him! What on earth will she do? It's most provoking, just at this very nick of time; he might have kept off a few hours longer. She won't come to the shrubbery now; she's frightened out of her life at that old ruffian, and, by George, I shall be put off again! After all I've said to Routh, after all the castles in the air which I've been building on the chance of getting free, I shall have to slink back to town empty-handed!" He was leaning over a gate in the hedge, and as he spoke he shook his fist at the unconscious country magistrate, visible in the distance now but by the crown of his hat. "Except," continued George, "knowing how deeply I'm involved, she'll risk all hazards and come to the shrubbery. Perhaps she's started now, not expecting him, and when he reaches the house and doesn't find her there—he's always hanging on her trail, curse him!—he will make inquiries and follow her. That would be worst of all, for not only should I miss what she promised me, but she would come to grief herself, poor darling. Well, I must chance it, whatever happens."

He turned down a by-lane which ran at right angles to the avenue, pursuing which he came upon a low park paling enclosing the shrubbery. Carefully looking round him, and finding no one within sight, he climbed the paling and dropped noiselessly upon the primrose-decked bank on the other side. All quiet; nothing moving but the birds darting in and out among the bright green trees, and the grasshoppers in myriads round his feet. The walk had tired him, and he lay down on the mossy turf and awaited his mother's coming. Twelve o'clock rings sharply out from the turret clock in Poynings stables. Twelve o'clock, the time appointed in his mother's letter for him to meet her in that very spot. He rose up from the turf, and sheltering himself behind the broad trunk of an old tree, looked anxiously in the direction of the house. No human being was to be seen. He left his vantage ground and strode listlessly to and fro; the quarter chime rung out from the turret, then the half hour, and still no one came.

Some one coming at last! George Dallas' quick eyes made out a female figure in the far distance, not his mother, though. This woman's back is bowed, her step slow and hesitating, unlike Mrs. Carruthers, on whose matronly beauty Time has as yet laid his gentlest touch. He must stand aside, he thought, amongst the trees until the new comer had passed by; but as the woman approached, her gait and figure seemed familiar to him, and when she raised her head and looked round her as though expecting some one, he recognized Nurse Brookes. The old woman gave a suppressed scream as George Dallas stepped out from among the trees and stood before her.

"I could not help it, George," said she, "I could not help it, though I was looking for and expecting you at that moment, and that's more than you were doing for me, isn't it? You were expecting some one else, my boy?"

"Is anything the matter? Is she ill? Has her husband found out?"

"Nothing! She's—well, as well may be, poor dear, and—"

"Then she hasn't been able to do what she promised?"

"O George, George, did you ever know her fail in doing what she promised, from the days when you were a baby until now? Better for her, poor thing, as I've often told her, if she hadn't—"

"Yes, yes, nurse, I know all about that, of course; but why isn't she here now?"

"She daren't come, George. Master's come home unexpected, and he and Miss Clare are with her, and there is no chance for her to make an excuse to get away. So she just runs into her dressing-room for a minute and sends to me—she always sends to me in her troubles, as you've seen many a time and oft, Master George—and tells me, she says, 'Take this and go into the shrubbery, and tell George,' she says, 'why I couldn't come, and that I sent it to him with my heart's love, and God bless him,' she says."

As the old woman spoke, she produced from her pocket a round flat parcel wrapped in writing-paper, which she handed to Dallas. He took it with a very weak attempt at unconcern (he did not know with how much of their secret his mother might have intrusted the old nurse), and thrust it into his breast pocket, saying at the same time, "Thanks, nurse. That's all right. Did she say anything else?"

"Nothing, I think. O yes—that of course now you would not remain in the neighborhood, and that you were to be sure to write to her, and send your address."

"She need not be afraid—I'm off at once! Good by, nurse. Tell my mother I'll hold to all I promised her. Thank her a thousand times, bless her! Good by, dear old woman; perhaps the next time we meet I shan't have to skulk in a wood when I want to see my mother!"

He pressed a hasty kiss on the old woman's upturned face, and hurried away. The last sound he had uttered seemed to have rekindled the old vindictive feeling in his mind, for as he strode away he muttered to himself: "Skulking in a wood, hiding behind trees—a pretty way for a son to seek his mother, and she never to come after all! Prevented by her fear of that pompous idiot, her husband. To think of her, as I recollect her, being afraid of an empty-headed dotard. And yet he is kind to her. She said so herself,—that's nothing; but Nurse Brookes said so too—that's something—that's everything. If he were not—if he treated her badly—he should rue it. But he is fond of her, and proud of her, as well he may be; and Clare, that charming girl, is his niece. Charming, indeed! Ah, Chapel Carruthers, you have a wholesome horror of me, but you little know that two guardian angels plead for you!"

The sight of the park paling over which he had climbed into the shrubbery, and over which lay his only way out of it, seemed to change the tenor of his thoughts. He stopped at once, and, looking cautiously round, stepped in among the trees, and drew from his breast the packet which Nurse Brookes had given him. He tore off the outer covering of writing-paper, and carefully placed it in his pocket, then he came to a purple morocco case, which he opened, and there before him, set off by the velvet on which it lay, was the bracelet, a band of dead gold, set with splendid wreaths of forget-me-nots in diamonds and turquoises. George Dallas took it up and examined it attentively, weighed it in his hand, looked closely at the stones in various lights, then replaced it in its case, as a smile of satisfaction spread over his face.

"No mistake about that!" said he. "Even I, all unaccustomed to such luxuries, know that this must be the right thing. She has sent it as she received it, in the very box, with the swell Bond street jeweler's name and all! Not a bad notion of a present, Mr. Carruthers, by any means. You've money, sir; but, it must be owned, you've taste also. It's only to be hoped that you've not very sharp eyesight, or that you'll ever be tempted to make a very close inspection of the Palais Royal bijouterie which is doing duty for this in the jewel box! These will set me clear with Routh, and leave me with a few pounds in my pocket besides, to begin life anew with. If it does that, and I can stick to my employment on The Mercury, and get a little more work somewhere else, and give up that infernal card-playing—that's the worst of it—I may yet make our friend C. C. believe I am not such a miserable scoundrel as he now imagines me!"

He replaced the case carefully in his breast-pocket, climbed the palings, and was once more on the high road, striding in the direction of Amherst. Ah, the castle-building, only occasionally interrupted by a return to the realities of life in squeezing the packet in his breast-pocket, which he indulged in during that walk! Free, with the chance and the power of making a name for himself in the world! free from all the debasing associations, free from Routh, from Harriet—from Harriet? Was that idea quite so congenial to his feelings? to be separated from Harriet, the only woman whom, in his idle, dissipated days, he had ever regarded with anything like affection, the only woman who—and then the bright laughing face and the golden hair of Clare Carruthers rose before his mind. How lovely she was, how graceful and bred-looking, above all, how fresh and youthful, how unsullied by any contact with the world, with all the native instincts pure and original, with no taught captivations or society charms, nothing but—

"Yoho! Yoho!"

George Dallas started from his revery at the repeated cry, and only just in time sprang from the middle of the road along which, immersed in thought, he had been plodding, as the mail-cart, with its red-faced driver, came charging full upon him. Awakened from his revery, he proceeded on his way to the inn, whence, having paid his bill, he returned to London by the first train.

During the whole of the journey up to town the young man's thoughts were filled with his intentions for the future, and no sooner had the train stopped at London Bridge than he determined to go at once to The Mercury office and announce his readiness to undertake any amount of work. Accordingly he struck away across the Borough, and, crossing Blackfriars Bridge, dived among a mass of streets running at right angles with Fleet street, until he arrived at a large, solemn, squat old building, over the door of which glimmered a lamp with the words Mercury Office in half-effaced characters. A smart pull at a sharp, round, big bell brought a preternaturally sharp boy to the door, who at once recognized the visitor and admitted him within the sacred precincts. Up a dark passage, up a steep and regular flight of stairs, George Dallas proceeded, until on the first floor he rapped at the door facing him, and, being bidden to come in, entered the editorial sanctum.

A large cheerless room, its floor covered with a ragged old Turkey carpet, on its walls two or three bookshelves crammed with books of reference, two or three maps, an old clock gravely ticking, and a begrimed bust, with its hair dust-powdered, and with layers of dust on its highly developed cheek-bones. In the middle of the room a battered old desk covered with blue books, letters opened and unopened, piles of manuscript under paper-weights, baskets with cards of invitation for all sorts of soirées, entertainments and performances, and snake-like india-rubber tubes for communication with distant printing offices or reporters' rooms, a big leaden inkstand like a bath, and a sheaf of pens more or less dislocated. At this desk sat a tall man of about fifty, bald-headed, large-bearded, with sharp gray eyes, well-cut features, and good presence. This was Mr. Leigh, editor of The Mercury; a man who had been affiliated to the press from the time of his leaving college, who had been connected with nearly all the morning journals in one capacity or another, correspondent here, manager there, descriptive writer, leader-writer, critic, and scrub, and who, always rising, had been recommended by the Jupiter Tonans of the press, the editor of The Statesman, to fill the vacant editorial chair at The Mercury. A long-headed, far-seeing man, Grafton Leigh, bright as a diamond, and about as hard, keen as a sword in the hands of a fine fencer, and as difficult to turn aside, earnest, energetic, devoted to his work, and caring for nothing else in comparison—not even for his wife, then sound asleep in his little house in Brompton, or his boy working for his exhibition from Westminster. He looked up as George entered, and his features, tightly set, relaxed as he recognized the young man.

"You, Ward!" said he. "We didn't look for you till to-morrow night. What rush of industry, what sudden desire to distinguish yourself, has brought you here to night, my boy?"

Before George could answer, a young man came forward from an inner room, and caught him by the hand.

"What Paul, old fellow, this is delicious! He must be brimming over with ideas, Chief, and has come down here to ventilate them."

"Not I," said George. "My dear Chief," addressing Leigh, "both you and Cunningham give me credit for more virture than I possess. I merely looked in as I passed from the railway, to see how things were going on."

"This is a sell," said Mr. Cunningham. "I thought I had booked you. You see that confounded Shimmer has failed us again. He was to have done us a sensation leader on the murder—"

"The murder! What murder?"

"O, ah, I lor forgot; happened since you went away. Wapping or Rotherhithe—some water-side place—body found, and all that kind of thing! Shimmer was to have done us one of his stirrers, full of adjectives, denouncing the supineness of the police, and that kind of thing, and he's never turned up, and the Chief has kept me here to fill his place. Confounded nuisance! I'm obliged to fall back on my old subject—Regulation of the City Traffic!"

"I'm very sorry for you, Cunningham," said George, laughing; "but I can't help you to-night. I'm seedy and tired, and I know nothing about the murder, and want to get to bed. However, I came to tell the Chief that I'm his now and forever, ready to do double task of work from to-morrow out."

"All right, Ward. So long as you don't overdo it, I shall always be delighted to have you with us," said Mr. Leigh. "Now get home to bed, for you look dog tired." And George Dallas shook hands with each and went away.

"Glad to hear we're going to have a good deal of work out of Ward, Chief." said Cunningham, when he and his editor were alone again. "He's deuced smart when he likes—as smart as Shimmer, and a great deal more polished and gentlemanly."

"Yes," said Grafton Leigh, "he's a decided catch for the paper. I don't think his health will last, though. Did you notice his manner to-night?—nerves agitated and twitching, like a man who had gone through some great excitement!"

CHAPTER X.

DISPOSED OF.

It was very late when George Dallas arrived at Routh's lodgings in South Moulton street, so that he felt it necessary to announce his presence by a peculiar knock, knowu only to the initiated. He made the accustomed signal, but the door was not opened for so abnormally long an interval that he began to think he should have to go away and defer telling of the good news until the morning. He had knocked three times and was about to turn away from the door when it was noiselessly opened by Harriet herself. She held a shaded candle in her hand, which gave so imperfect a light that Dallas could hardly see her distinctly enough to feel certain that his first impression, that she was looking very pale and ill was not an imagination induced by the dim light. She asked him to come into the sitting-room, and said she had just turned the gas out and was going to bed.

"I am sorry to have disturbed you," he said, when she had set down the candle on a table, without re lighting the gas; "but I want to see Routh particularly. Is he in?"

"No," said Harriet, "he is not. Did you get his letter?"

"What letter? I have not heard from him. I have only just come up from Amherst. But you look ill, Mrs. Routh. Does anything ail you? Is anything wrong?"

"No," she said, hurriedly, "nothing, nothing. Routh has been worried, that's all, and I am very tired."

She pushed the candle further away as she spoke, and, placing her elbow on the table, rested her head on her hand. George looked at her with concern. He had a kind heart and great tenderness for women and children, and he could forget, or, at all events, lay aside his own anxieties in a moment at the sight of suffering in a woman's face. His look of anxious sympathy irritated Harriet; she moved uneasily and impatiently, and said, almost harshly:

"Never mind my looks, Mr. Dallas; they don't matter. Tell me how you have sped on your errand at Poynings. Has your mother kept her promise? Have you got the money? I hope so, for I am sorry to say Stewart wants it badly, and has been reckoning on it eagerly. I can't imagine how it happened you did not get his letter."

"I have succeeded," said George. "My mother has kept her word, God bless her, and I came at once to tell Routh he can have the money."

He stopped in the full tide of his animated speech, and looked curiously at Harriet. Something in her manner struck him as being unusual. She was evidently anxious about the money, glad to see him, and yet oddly absent. She did not look at him, and while he spoke she had turned her head sharply once or twice, while her upraised eyelids and parted lips gave her face a fleeting expression of intense listening. She instantly noticed his observation of her, and said, sharply:

"Well, pray go on; I am longing to hear your story."

"I thought you were listening to something; you looked as if you heard something," said George.

"So I am listened—to you," Harriet replied, with a smile. "So I do hear your adventures. There's nobody up in the house but myself. Pray go on."

So George went on, and told her all that had befallen him at Amherst, with one important reservation—he said nothing of Clare Carruthers or his two meetings with the heiress at the Sycamores; but he told her all about his interview with his mother, and the expedient to which she had resorted to supply his wants. Harriet Routh listened to his story intently; but when she heard that he had received from Mrs. Carruthers, not money, but jewels, she was, evidently, disconcerted.

"Here is the bracelet," said George, as he took the little packet from the breast-pocket of his coat and handed it to her. "I don't know much about such things, Mrs. Routh, but perhaps you do. Are the diamonds very valuable?

Harriet had opened the morocco case containing the bracelet while he was speaking, and now she lifted the beautiful ornament from its satin bed and held it on her open palm.

"I am not a very capable judge," she said; "but I think these are very fine and valuable diamonds. They are extremely beautiful." And a gleam of color came into her white face as she looked at the gems with a woman's irresistible admiration of such things.

"I can't tell you how much I feel at taking them from her," said George. "It's like a robbery, isn't it?" And he looked full and earnestly at Harriet.

She started, let the bracelet fall, stooped to pick it up, and as she raised her face again, it was whiter than before.

"How can you talk such nonsense?" she said, with a sudden resumption of her usual captivating manner. "Of course it isn't. Do you suppose your mother ever had as much pleasure in these gewgaws in her life as she had in giving them to you? Besides you know you're going to reform and be steady, and take good advice, are you not?" She watched him very keenly, though her tone was gay and trifling. George reddened, laughed awkwardly, and replied:

"Well, I hope so; and the first step, you know, is to pay my debts. So I must get Routh to put me in the way of selling this bracelet at once. I suppose there's no difficulty about it. I'm sure I have heard it said that diamonds are the same as ready money, and the sooner the tin is in Routh's pocket the better pleased I'll be. None the less obliged to him, though, Mrs. Routh; remember that, both for getting me out of the scrape and for waiting so long and good-humoredly for his money."

For all the cordiality of his tone, for all the gratitude he expressed, Harriet felt in her inmost heart, and told herself she felt that he was a changed man; that he felt his freedom, rejoiced in it, and did not mean again to relinquish or endanger it.

"The thing he feared has happened," she thought, while her small white fingers were busy with the jewels. "The very thing he feared. This man must bo got away—how am I to do it?"

The solitary candle was burning dimly; the room was dull, cold and gloomy. George looked round, and was apparently thinkiug of taking his leave, when Harriet said:

"I have not told you how opportune your getting this money—for I count it as money—is. Stay; let me light the gas. Sit down there opposite to me and you shall hear how things have gone with us since you went away." She had thrown off the abstraction of her manner, and in a moment she lighted the gas, put the extinguished candle out of sight, set wine upon the table, and pulled a comfortable arm-chair forward, in which she begged George to seat himself. "Take off your coat," she said; and he obeyed her, telling her, with a laugh, as he flung it upon a chair, that there was a small parcel of soiled linen in the pocket.

CONCERNING STORIES.

THE bewildering number of new magazines and the amount of material, such as it is, which goes to fill them, is not the least wonder of our time. Besides the leading tale, the piece of poetry, the column of jokes, or the solid article, which nearly all contain, there is usually a short sketch or story, and it is with this branch of periodical catering that we have to deal. If examined closely, these stories indicate a great deal more than would appear on their own showing. First on the score of antiquity, they can claim priority over the big novel itself, which precedes them in order of place, and is being slowly conducted upon an illustrated career under the direction of a popular author. Before the novel came the novelette,—homunculus before homo. Stories are probably as old as speech but your novel (we use the word in its ordinary acceptatiou) always from its length, required to be booked. The Greeks told stories, and very good ones. Antonius Diogenes went in for a regular romance,—the loves of Dinias and Dyreyilis; but it possesses nothing in common with our works of fiction, except, of course, the element of tender passions, without, which nothing of the kind could move. But the Greek tales were excellent. Even in the Greek Christian times, when Pan was dead, capital adventures were struck out, which, if they dealt rather freely with sacred subjects, one is inclined to condone for their offences on the ground of no harm done.

In the Middle Ages these tales were re echoed along with others, and enriched, too, with marvels brought from the East, monsters from the North, and plenty of devils from the monastic legends. Then there were the jongleurs, minnesingers, and troubadours, who traveled on the strength of a popular taste for verse stories; but if report speaks true concerning the jongleurs, they added to their repertoires an attraction similar to that which brings nightly crowds to the ballet music halls of London. Italy is regarded as the direct source of our novels and novelists. Baccaccio's tales were known under the latter title, and to some Italian stories we are said to be indebted for "The Merchant of Venice." The Middle Age narratives were all pretty nearly of one color, and of rather a high flavor for our generation. but many of them were both clever or caustic. Longfellow gives an excellent imitation or adaption of one in his "Martin Franc, or the Monk of St. Anthony." Our English tales of the Elizabethan age are singularly dull and pointless. After the Restoration they were livelier, when, to parphase a hackneyed quotation.

"The taste became more Galic and less nice;" but in the days of Queen Anne, under the direction of Mr. Addison, the stories were mere galvanized abstractions, thinly disguised allegories, in which Greeks and full-bottomed wig of the "Spectator's" Romans imparted elegant precepts in the period. Nor was the great lexicogropher a good story teller. In the "Rambler," men and women are made to speak language as fine and improbable as the speeches which the worthy doctor prescribed for his tory favorites in the House of Commons. Goldsmith, however, was a delightful narrator; the "History of the Philosophic Vagabond" is a gem in this way. Fielding had a heavy manner of going about a story; but Smollet was a master in the craft. When the Della Cruscan gushing spoiled our poetry, stories in that strange tongue appeared in "Amulets" and "Souvenirs." The plates in those books used to be Della Cruscan too—finical, nerveless, and emasculate. A great improvement took place in the palmy days of "Blackwood," "Fraser," and "Bentley." A sort of Hogarthian humor pervaded the shorter tales,—a humor of which the contemporaneous artists caught a fair share of the spirit. Maginn, Thackeray, Barham, and Lockhart were seldom better than when confined to chapters instead of volumes. It is remarkable, indeed, that as stories fast gave rise to novels, we may notice that every romantic writer of original power sends up a few pilot balloons fashioned in his own peculiar style, before venturing the grand ascent. Mr. Dickens felt his ground with Boz; and the author of "Vanity Fair" intrusted Michael Angelo Titmarsh with samples of his ware, previous to making his own proper appearance. Here we claim an argument for our plea, that stories precede books. In the late Professor Aytoun's hands the art of story-telling did not degenerate; but for occasional blots of "wut" they would be perfect of their kind. There is real fun in his tales, and fun is the prime charcteristic of them.

To add another feather to the story cap. it is said that Poe's wild inventions contain the germs of more than one sensation novel, and that a very clever author who works the sensation department made the discovery at an early period of his literary career. There is some truth, we believe, in this, but not at all enough to make out the least pretext for a charge of plagiarism.

It is not easy to meet with a good story now; such a one as Tom Hood or Jerrold could write—such a one as was wont to light up the pages of magazines which erst were disagreeably tinged with political war paint. Every week tons of periodicals are carried from the news agents, and sown broadcast over the land, and nearly all contains something in the shape of a novelette. It is well for the makers of those literary confections that our literary society, with its complicated wants and new passions, supplies them with an inexhaustible quantity of raw material. They have fifty plans for serving the crumbled rose leaf which interferes with the sybapitism attributed in cheap literature to the upper classes. They can pile the delicious agony on a foundation as slight as the gossamer trouble which shades the brow of the lovely countess when dear Lord Ernest Adolphus Fitz Howard has missed bringing her down to dinner, or, as we ought to say, led her to the scene of festivity. They can be cynical at times, but with that air of killing Don Juanism which reminds us of, "O Mr. Snoobs! how can you be so sarcastic?" In the sentimeutal vein they have almost come round to see Miss Seward again. We have recently seen both pictures and letterpress in a popular monthly, fragrant of the "Forget-me-not" and "Bijou" of our grandmothers. As for stories of the genuine story kind, they are as hard to find as real Madera. The editors, we suppose, are compelled to accept the rubbish which is shot out on us through dearth of better; the most hopeless thing about these inventions would seem to be, that they show nowhere that "genius in the making," as it were, which years ago resulted in "Pendennis," and "David Copperfield."

Mystery.—In the beauty of form, or of moral character, or of the material creation, it is that which is most veiled which is most beautiful. The mysteries of the heart and of nature are the delight of the intellect, the soul, and the eyes. It seems as if the Creator had drawn a shadow over whatever he has made most delicate and most divine to highten our aspirations after it by its secrecy and to soften its luster from our gaze, as he has placed lids over our eyes to temper the impression of light upon them, and night over the stars to incite us to follow and seek them in their airy ocean and measure his power and greatness by those studs of fire which his fingers, as they touch the vault of heaven, have stamped on the firmament. Valleys are the mysteries of landscapes. The more we long to penetrate them, the more they try to wind, bury, and hide themselves. Mist is to Mountains what illusion is to love—it elevates them. Mystery hovers over everything here below and solemnizes all things to the eyes and heart.—Lamartine.

Women are a great mystery. According to Haller, women bear hunger longer than men; according to Plutarch, they can resist the effects of wine better; according to Unger, they grow older and never bald; according to Pliny, they are seldom attacked by lions, (on the contrary, they will run after lions;) and according to Gunter, they can talk a few!

Of the durability of timber in a wet state, the piles of the bridge built by the Emperor Tragau over the Danube afford a striking example. One of these piles was taken up and found to be petrified to the depth of three-quarters of an inch, but the rest of the wood was perfect.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

THE NOVELISTS AND THE CLERGY.

THE September number of the North British contains the most complete and thoroughly critical article on George Eliot's novels that we have yet met with. Indeed, it is the only "criticism" of them in the strict sense of that much abused word that we remember to have seen. Speaking of the author in the character of a teacher and moral instructor—which character the reviewer accords to her—he says:

"This knowledge of the various forms of religious feeling to be found in the heart of man, and this sympathy with them all, enhance greatly the power of George Eliot's writings. It would be well if such knowledge and sympathy were possessed in the same measure by our professed religious teachers. This present age is in no real sense of the word sceptical, yet we suspect there has seldom been a time in which there was a greater gulf fixed between the clergy and the educated laity. Our clerical dignitaries are startled now and again by some outspoken heresy; they would be a good deal more startled were they made aware how much of what they call heresy is unspoken, merely because it has become an ordinary habit of thought. They are absorbed in their noisy contests—believing sincerely that matters of vital import are at stake; unconscious that the great bulk of the laity looks on with indifference, nay with contempt, save when indignation is roused by some act of clerical intolerance more heinous than common, yet also with a feeling of sorrowful regret, that between them and their teachers there is no sympathy, that to their teachers they can look for no guidance. It is full time the clergy should look to it, when laymen find more that is akin to their modes of thought on religious subjects in the writings of novelists like Thackeray or George Eliot, than in all the teaching of all the churches. In this particular, George Eliot's subtlety, liberality, sympathy with mankind, and fervor of feeling, deserve the heartiest recognition. Few can hope to rival her powers; but all might seek to imitate the spirit in which she approaches these themes.

"When any question of morality arises, George Eliot's tone is not less lofty than in treating of matters more peculiarly religious. Her point of view is always pure and high-minded. Her comments and criticisms, either upon the actual transactions of the tale, or upon life generally, are penetrated with a striking nobility of sentiment."

An example of George Eliot's mode of dealing with religious themes, and of the knowledge, experience, and thorough fidelity with which she handles such subjects the reviewer makes some quotations:

"I don't understand these new sort o' doctrines. When Mr. Barton comes to see me, he talks about nothing but my sins and my need o' marcy. Now, Mr. Hackit, I've never been a sinner. From the fust beginning, when I went into service, I al'ys did my duty by my employers I was as good a wife as any's in the county—never aggravated my husband. The cheese-factor used to say my cheese was al'ys to be depended on. I've known women, as their cheeses swelled a shame to be seen, when their husbands had counted on the cheese-money to make up their rent; and yet they'd three gowns to my one. If I'm not to be saved, I know a many as are in a bad way. But it's well for me as I can't go to church any longer, for if th' old singers are to be done away with, there'll be nothing left as it was in Mr. Patten's time; and what's more, I hear you've settled to pull the church down and build it up new?"

Equally natural, yet entirely different in feeling, is this:

"Mrs. Raynor had been reading about the lost sheep, and the joy there is in heaven over the sinner that repenteth. Surely the eternal love she believed in through all the sadness of her lot would not leave her child to wander farther and farther into the wilderness till there was no turning—the child so lovely, so pitiful to others, so good, till she was goaded into sin by woman's bitterest sorrows! Mrs. Raynor had her faith and her spiritual comforts, though she was not in the least evangelical, and knew nothing of doctrinal zeal. I fear most of Mr. Tryan's hearers would have considered her destitute of saving knowledge, and I am quite sure she had no well-defined views on justification. Nevertheless, she read her Bible a great deal, and thought she found divine lessons there—how to bear the cross meekly, and be merciful. Let us hope that there is a saving ignorance, and that Mrs. Raynor was justified without knowing exactly how."

In quite another and loftier vein is the following, which contains more pith and substance than a score of even the better class of modern sermons:

"His mind was destitute of that dread which has been erroneously decried as if it were nothing higher than a man's animal care for his own skin: that awe of the Divine Nemesis which was felt by religious pagans, and, though it took a more positive form under Christianity, is still felt by the mass of mankind simply as a vague fear at anything which is called wrong-doing. Such terror of the unseen is so far above mere sensual cowardice that it will annihilate that cowardice: it is the initial recognition of a moral law restraining desire, and checks the hard bold scrutiny of imperfect thought into obligations which can never be proved to have any sanctity in the absence of feeling."

* * * * * * *

"Nevertheless, Evangelicalism had brought into palpable existence and operation in Milby society that idea of duty, that recognition of something to be lived for beyond the mere satisfaction of self, which is to the moral life what the addition of a great central ganglion is to animal life. No man can begin to mould himself on a faith or an idea without rising to a higher order of experience: a principle of subordination, of self mastery, has been introduced into his nature; he is no longer a mere bundle of impressions, desires, and impulses. Whatever might be the weaknesses of the ladies who pruned the luxuriance of their lace and ribbons, cut out garments for the poor, distributed tracts, quoted Scripture, and defined the true gospel, they had learned this—that there was a divine work to be done in life, a rule of goodness higher than the opinion of their neighbors; and if the notion of a heaven in reserve for themselves was a little too prominent, yet the theory of fitness for that heaven consisted in purity of heart, in Christlike compassion, in the subduing of selfish desires. They might give the name of piety to much that was only puritanic egoism; they might call many things sin that were not sin; but they had at least the feeling that sin was to be avoided and resisted and color-blindness, which may mistake drab for scarlet, is better than total blindness which sees no distinction of color at all.

A FORGOTTEN POET.

To the great majority of readers of this generation the name of "Peacock," as an author, will sound most unfamiliar, yet fifty years ago he had no mean reputation both as a poet and a novelist. Shelley praised his "genius and power;" Byron declared that he should not himself have had the slightest objection to father Peacock's poem, "Rhododaphne;" and his novels. "Headlong Hall," and "Nightmare Abbey," were quite as much admired in their day as Mr. Reade's are now. Such is the durability of literary reputation. His songs, most of which occur in his novels, are among the best in the language, of the jovial, rollicking kind; and his more serious efforts in the poetical line, are distinguished for directness and simplicity, which qualities Peacock thought upon principle to be essential to the best poetry. Hence, he hated all artificial elaboration, and never was a believer in Tennyson, whose earlier poems he lived to criticise. The following verses, which occur in one of his novels, will furnish an idea of his poetical style:

LOVE AND AGE.

"I played with you 'mid cowslips blowing,
When I was six and you were four;
When garlands weaving, flower-balls throwing,
Were pleasures soon to please no more.
Through groves and meads, o'er grass and heather,
With little playmates, to and fro,
We wandered hand in hand together;
But that was sixty years ago.

"You grew a lovely roseate maiden,
And still our early love was strong;
Still with no care our days were laden,
They glided joyously along;
And I did love you, very dearly—
How dearly, words want power to show;
I thought your heart was touched as nearly;
But that was fifty years ago

"Then other lovers came around you,
Your beauty grew from year to year,
And many a splendid circle found you
The centre of its glittering sphere.
I saw you then, first vows forsaking,
On rank and wealth your hand bestow;
Oh, then I thought my heart was breaking—
But that was forty years ago.

"And I lived on, to wed another;
No cause she gave me to repine;
And when I heard you were a mother,
I did not wish the children mine.
My own young flock, in fair progression,
Made up a pleasant Christmas row;
My joy in them was past expression—
But that was thirty years ago.

"You grew a matron plump and comely,
You dwelt in fashion's brightest blaze;
My earthly lot was far more homely;
But I too had my festal days.
No merrier eyes have ever glistened
Around the hearth stone's wintry glow,
Than when my youngest child was christened—
But that was twenty years ago.

"Time passed. My eldest girl was married,
And I am now a grandsire grey;
One pet of four years old I've carried
Among the wild flowered meads to play.
In our old fields of childish pleasure,
Where now, as then, the cowslips blow,
She fills her basket's ample measure—
And that is not ten years ago.

"But though first love's impassioned blindness
Has passed away in colder light,
I still have thought of you with kindness,
And shall do, till our last good-night.
The ever-rolling silent hours
Will bring a time we shall not know,
When our young days of gathering flowers
Will be an hundred years ago."

A RISING AMERICAN POET.

Perhaps some of our readers will remember a literary weekly, called The Century, which was started in New York some eight years since by Mr. McElrath, Greeley's former partner in the Tribune; and if so, they are quite likely to remember certain contributions in verse that appeared in it from time to time with the name of "Dorgan" affixed to them as author. They were quite noticeable productions, being marked by much beauty and decided originality. After the decease of the Century this writer appeared to have discontinued contributing to the literary periodicals, and we heard no more of him until 1864, when he published a little book of verses entitled Studies, which, though evincing poetic talent of a very high order, failed for some reason to find much favor at the hands either of the critics or of the public. Recently, however, a new edition of the volume has been issued at Philadelphia, and as we see from the notices of it in the Eastern papers, the poet is now in a fair way of winning the recognition he deserves. The pieces are mainly the same included in the former edition, but the manufacturer's of fame are in a more appreciative mood, and in various journals—the N. Y. Tribune among the number—Mr. Dorgan is hailed as "the coming man." The N. Y. Home Journal speaks of him as follows:

"He has more imagination and more freedom of rhythmical sweep than any poet who has yet arisen in America. Moreover, his imagination, instead of being of that physical order which marks the imagery of Swinburne, is often nobly august and sublimely spiritual. As the title of the volume (Studies) imports, we are not to look for completeness or sustained effort in the poems before us, but rather for indications of the poetic excellence which may be within the possibility of Mr. Dorgan's compassing; and, viewing his present publication in ea luce, we confess that we know of no poet who is capable of attaining weirder and more ethereal poetic summits than the author of this little volume. That this is high and enthusiastic praise we are aware; but we set it down deliberately, nevertheless. Mr. Dorgan should, having gained the point of getting a publisher, write a nobly-sustained and ideal poem, (of which he is capable,) and take his place in the first rank of American poets."

SWINBURNE AND HIS CRITICS.

The new volume of Swinburne's poems, entitled "Laus Veneris, and other Poems and Ballads," which has been announced to be issued by Carleton, in New York, during the present month, has been about as effectually advertised by means of the fastidious criticism it has provoked, as was Reade's Griffith Gaunt, and the same result—an enormous sale—may be anticipated for the "naughty" poems. The London Examiner, speaking of the withdrawal of the volume by Moxon, characterizes it as "an act of weakness of which any publisher, who does not give himself up to the keeping of a milk-walk for the use of babes, has reason to be heartily ashamed." Among the other rumors afloat on the subject, is one to the effect that the poet is about to publish a reply to his critics, more particularly to those of the Saturday Review—not a very wise step generally, nor one in which the author often gets the best of the encounter, Byron's case being the exception to the rule. It is at any rate to be hoped that Mr. Swinburne will not model his "reply" upon that of Reade.

A NEW BOOK BY W. W. STORY.

The Proportions of the Human Form, according to a New Canon, is the title of a new book by William W. Story, the Sculptor, which has recently been issued at London. The N. Y. Home Journal, from which our account of it is derived, says that it opens with a "scholastic investigation of the ancient Cabala of the old Egyptian and Greek philosophers, showing the wonderful and mysterious influence of figures and certain numbers as referring to philosophy, mathematics, religion, and the proportions of the human form."

The critic then delivers himself after the following astounding fashion: "We can say that the book is greatly superior to any other ancient or modern of which we have any account." The italics are ours. Probably the author of this portentous and sweeping criticism meant to say that Mr. Story's system was "superior," etc.

One of the New York weeklies announces that the Harper's are about to issue "a posthumous prose tale by Edgar A. Poe." If Poe left any such tale it is not a little singular that nothing has been heard of it before. Poe was not in the habit of keeping available manuscript in his possession after it was completed. Whatever he could find a sale for, was generally disposed of before the ink was dry.

A new and elegantly illustrated edition of Drake's Culprit Fay is to be issued for the holidays. It is to contain one hundred original illustrations, printed in the best manner upon the finest tinted paper, and, it is said, will compare favorably with any illustrated books of foreign manufacture. It is a curious illustration of the progress of critical taste in the United States, that this fantastic poem, once so universally praised and admired, and which N. P. Willis pronounced one of the finest poems of fancy in the language, is now seldom mentioned in any of the Eastern literary journals without a sneer.

It is stated that James Wood Davidson, of Columbia, South Carolina, is writing a book, entitled The Litterateurs of the South.

Ticknor & Fields have issued a new volume of critical essays by E. P. Whipple, who acquired considerable celebrity twelve or fifteen years ago by an elaborate criticism of Macaulay. A paper on Hawthorne is spoken of as the most interesting article in the present volume.

THE SIMPLICITY OF THE LAW.—Tom strikes Dick over the shoulders with a rattan as big as your little finger. The lawyer, in his indictment, will tell you the story as follows:

"And that whereas the said Thomas, at the said place, on the day and year aforesaid, in and upon the body of the said Richard, against the peace and dignity of the State, did make a most violent assault, and inflict a great many and divers blows, kicks, cuffs, thumps, bumps, and contusions, gashes, hurts, wounds, damages, and injuries, in and upon the head and neck," etc., etc., for pages.

VIRTUE.

O WOMAN! what a wretch thou art,
If virtue reigns not in thy heart;
By some kind Providence designed,
To comfort and to bless mankind;
Like some sweet angel from above,
To cheer the fireside with thy love,
And make thy home a home of peace,
Where joys connubial never cease;
Where looks and honied words are kind,
And tender ties affections bind;—
Who dare invade such hallowed ground,
Where no dark passions lurk around?

Oft beauty Virtue's claims neglect,
Who courts not but commands respect;
Cased in an armor that's divine,
She, sleepless, guards her sacred shrine,
And shuns the gilded halls of vice,
Where bastard virtue hath its price;
Despising Mammon's purse-proud slaves,
She spurns the proffered gold of knaves;
Her heart from all deceit is free,
And looks for strength, O God, to thee!
She may be poor but still her name,
Untarnished is by deeds of shame;
She may be clothed in rags and need
In touching tones with pity plead,
Yet, conscious that she's pure and just,
She keeps secure her priceless trust.

While others quaff libations up,
She spurns the dangers of the cup,
And proudly with imperious frown,
She casts the tempting goblet down;
Her sober reason strong and pure,
Knows reeling thrones are insecure,
So sparkling wine may fire the brain,
And lead to years of bitter pain;
The scornful flashing of her eye,
All crafty snares of art defy;
From her one keen, indignant glance,
Forbids a villain to advance;
Confused he seeks a swift retreat,
Or kneels a craven at her feet;
She towers above all vice and shame,
And glories in her stainless name.

When Honor comes with motive pure,
The welcome is made sweetly sure;
Her modest and her simple air,
And blushes on her cheeks so fair;
The music of her guileless tongue,
That never worth and merit stung;
The curtains that so mildly rise
And graceful hang o'er wistful eyes;
The gentle heaving of the breast,
Where all the passions calmly rest,
Present a bride so true and warm,
That shafts of envy fail to harm;
Her loving heart when fairly won,
The brightest jewel 'neath the sun,
Confiding in her chosen spouse,
Keeps sacred all her bridal vows.

San Francisco, November 1866. JAMES LINEN.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE.

IF the undevout astronomer is mad, as has been alleged, so also is the undevout naturalist. No theory which does not admit that Infinite Intelligence, operating through a system of fixed laws, controls all the operations of nature, can rationally explain the order and regularity by which they are characterized.

The periodic movements and changes which take place in the animal and vegetable kingdoms are palpably the results of immutable laws. They never vary, either in time or manner. Precisely at the same seasons, year after year, the birds of passage perform their pilgrimage, and the migrants of the sea are equally punctual. The swallows are always true to time; the shad, herring, and mackerel never disappoint us. The hibernating mouse could not "turn in" and "turn out" with greater regularity if it consulted the almanac, nor the ermine and the sable put on and put off their cold-weather coats with a stricter regard to dates, if they were subject to army regulations. Insects appear and disappear without fail, rain or shine. Trees, buds, plants, flowers, seeds, ripen, leaves fall, as if by the calendar, and it has been said that if an observant naturalist, who had long been shut out from the light of day and the society of men, without any means of measuring time, were suddenly brought blindfolded into the fields and woods, he would be able, from the notes of the birds and the odors of the flowers, to discover the exact period of the year.

Athesists, or men professing to be atheists, tell us that this fair world of ours, and all this order and regularity, were and are the offspring of chance. When chance shall have made a watch, but not till then, it may be worth while for those of us who read with reverent eyes the gospel of nature, and look up through it to its holy Author, to chop logic with atheists, pantheists, and materialists.

Music.

THE man that hath no music in himself,
And is not moved with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils;
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections are dark as Erebus:
Let no such man be trusted.—Shakspeare.

AMUSEMENTS.

AT MAGUIRES OPERA HOUSE the engagement of Miss Kingsbury, after running through eight weeks of the most profitable business ever played in that theatre, will terminate with this afternoon and evening's performances. Miss Kingsbury will make a trip inland during the present month accompanied by most of the present Opera House company.

Lady Don, the popular actress and vocalists, will commence her farewell engagement on Monday evening, supported by Mr. Harry Edwards, the Misses Corcoran, and an entire new stock company, consisting of George Pardey, S. W. Leach. Michael Feeny, Thompson, and others. Mr. Edwards and the Misses Corcoran—new comers, lately from Australia—have rendered very efficient support to Lady Don in her up country trip, and have been most favorably received. The company have been selected with a view to the requirements of the peculiar musical and burlesque pieces of Lady Don's repertoire, and we can safely predict a profitable as well as a pleasant season.

The Benefits of the week—Mrs. Jacksons on Monday; W. A. Kendall's ("Comet Quirls") on Wednesday; and Miss Kingsbury's last evening, were all successful ones.

This afternoon The Marble Heart. This evening Othello, Miss Kingsbury as "Desdemonia."—her last appearance; Mr. McCullough as "Iago;" Mr Harry Edwards as "Othello;" and Mrs. Jackson as "Emelia,"—a strong cast. Monday evening, Lady Don and the new company in the Child of the Regiment, to conclude with Brough's new burlesque of Conrad and Medora.

THE MARTINETTI TROUPE at the Metropolitan have drawn several good audiences—which they could not fail of doing from having their names allied with the old Ravel troupe, though that troupe retired from the stage a dozen years ago. This much will reputation do. But San Francisco audiences are proverbially critical, and are not apt to be influenced long by the dead reputations of those who appear before them; vide Matilda Heron, Vestvali, and Madame Celeste. If the Martinetti's would win popularity here let them shake off the dead lion's skin, and produce something that will gain a name for themselves. Their success in San Francisco must depend upon their own merits and capabilities, and we trust soon to have something better from the repertoire of the troupe. For fear our remarks may be misconstrued undkindly we add the verdict of some of our contemporaries. The Golden Era says: "The Green Monster is a pleasing but not remarkable pantomime. The stage tricks and transformations were simple compared with other pieces of the same class as presented in this city." The Call warns them "that if they would enjoy a prosperous season, they must exert themselves in the production of novelty—The Contrabandists and The Green Monster being worn threadbare years ago." And the Dramatic Chronicle says of the Green Monster that "tricks introduced by the Ravels are omitted in the representation of this piece." And naively adds that "members of the ballet will no doubt show excellence on some future occassion."—we hope so.

LINCOLN SCHOOL EXHIBITION AT LINCOLN HALL.—The time of holding this exhibition has been changed so as to take place on Thursday and Friday evenings December 6th and 7th instead of the 13th and 14th as at first announced. This exhibition will be given for the purpose of raising a permanent Medal fund for the school—the interest of which is to be expended in procuring medals for pupils who distinguish themselves in deportment and scholarship. The exhibition is to consist principally of music, declamations, and recitations by the pupils of Lincoln school, and its object is a most worthy one.

"THE MISSION OF THE DRAMA."—Mrs. Laura Cuppy is to deliver a free lecture on this theme at Maguire's Opera House to-morrow (Sunday) evening at half-past seven. We are requested to state that this lecture will be strictly confined to the subject announced, and will not—as many may suppose—be made a medium for the advocacy of the doctrines of Spiritualism.

CHARACTER.—There is a glare about worldly success which is very apt to dazzle men's eyes. When we see a man rising in the world, thriving in business, successful in his speculations, if he be a man out of our own line, who does not come into competition with us, so as to make us jealous of him, we are too apt to form a foolishly high opinion of his merits. We are apt to say within ourselves, "What a wonderful man this must be, to rise so rapidly!" forgetting that dust, and straw, and feathers—things with neither weight nor value in them—rise the soonest and the easiest. In like manner, it is not the truly good and great man, generally speaking, who rises the most rapidly into wealth and notice. A man may be sharp, active, quick, dexterous, cunning; he may be ever on the watch for opportunities to push his fortunes; a man of this kind hardly fail of getting on in the world; yet, with all this, he may not have a grain of real sense about him. He may be all we have described, and yet have no greatness of mind, no greatness of soul. He may be utterly without sympathy and fellow-feeling for others; he may be utterly devoid of all true wisdom; he may be without piety and without charity; without love, that is, either for God or man.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 8.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

MAGENDIE ON MEDICINE.—An American medical student, writing from Paris to the American Medical Gazette for June, asserts that he once heard Magendie—one of the most eminent French physicians and physiologists—commence a lecture somewhat in the following words:

Gentlemen—Medicine is a great humbug. I know it is called a science—science, indeed! It is nothing like science. Doctors are mere empirics, when they are not charlatans. We are as ignorant as men can be. Who knows anything in the world about medicine? Gentlemen, you have done me the honor to come here to attend my lectures, and I must tell you frankly now, in the beginning, that I know nothing in the world about medicine, and I don't know anybody who does know anything about it. Don't think for a moment that I haven't read the bills advertising the course of lectures at the Medical School; I know that this man teaches anatomy, that man teaches pathology, another man physiology, such a one therapeutics, and another materia medica—Eh bien! El apres? What's known all about that? Why, gentlemen, at the school of Montpelier, (God knows it was famous enough in its day,) they discarded the study of anatomy, and taught nothing but the dispensary; and the doctors educated there knew just as much, and were quite as successful as any others. I repeat it, nobody knows anything about medicine. True enough, we are gathering facts every day. We can produce typhus fever, for example, by injecting a certain substance into the veins of a dog—that's something; we alleviate diabetes, and I see distinctly we are fast approaching the day when phthisis can be be cured as easily as any disease. We are collecting facts in the right spirit, and I dare say in a century or so the accumulation of facts may enable our successors to form a medical science; but I repeat it to you, there is no such thing now as a medical science. Who can tell me how to cure the headache? or the gout? or disease of the heart? Nobody. Oh! you tell me doctors cure people. I grant you, people are cured. But how are they cured? Gentlemen, nature does a great deal. Imagination does a great deal. Doctors do—devilish little—when they don't do harm. Let me tell you, gentlemen, what I did when I was the head physician at the Hotel Dieu. Some 3,000 or 4,000 patients passed through my hands every year. I divided the patients into two classes; with one, I followed the dispensary and gave them the usual medicines without having the least idea why or wherefore; to the other, I gave bread pills and colored water, without, of course, letting them know anything about it—and occasionally, gentlemen, I would create a third division to whom I gave nothing whatever. These last would fret a good deal, they would feel they were neglected, (sick people always feel they are neglected, unless they are well drugged—the fools!) and they would irritate themselves until they really got sick, but nature invariably came to the rescue, and all the persons in this third class got well. There was little mortality among those who received but bread pills and colored water, and the mortality was greatest among those who were carefully drugged according to the dispensary.

THE time to truly enjoy and appreciate one of "Dr. Bourne's Baths" is upon a cold or rainy day, when you feel chilly and "bad." The change in your feelings is remarkable, and in fact quite surprising to those who have not experienced it. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

COLDS, COUGHS, BRONCHITIS, incipient consumption pleurisy, and in fact all diseases of the throat and chest, cured, (not patched up,) and cures guaranteed, by Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

DR. BOURE guarantees cures because he understands his art, and has the means within his control for accomplishing his undertakings.

MEAGHER, TAAFFE & CO.—From the extensive business and business resources of this firm, aided by their liberal system of advertising, the firm-name at the head of this article must be very familiar with the public. A recent visit to their large retail store surprised us as to the extent and variety of their business.

Innumerable shelves extend through the whole length of the store crowded with the choicest dress fabrics—silks that will almost stand alone; merinos, poplins, rich laces and embroideries—cloaks and shawls, hosiery and furnishing goods. All divided into departments, and each presided over by a competent corps of salesmen proficient in their particular line of goods.

Great pyramids of house-keeping and domestic goods—linens, flannels blankets, sheetings and shirtings—as well as of dress goods, stand in the middle of the floor and on the ends of spare counters. Everything betokens the immense business and resources of the firm who established their retail store only about two years ago, although their business now far excels that of any of their competitors.

The great success of MEAGHER, TAAFFE & CO., is simply that they have invested a sufficient capital to import direct, buying their staple articles from the manufacturer at the lowest cash rates, and are always ready with the cash, both in New York and in San Francisco, to take advantage of the large invoice cash auction sales, and purchase largely at the lowest rates under the hammer of the auctioneer. Goods so sold are of course disposed of greatly under prices. They are immediately sent to their retail store, and soon retailed over the counter at a slight advance—to be followed again by other auction purchases. It is these purchases that are advertised in the city papers every few weeks, and it is by this system of business that this house has acquired its tremendous patronage. The female portion of the community, ever alive to the procuring of bargains, know they can find them at MEAGHER, TAAFFE & CO.'s, and there they will go to make their purchases.

THE "HAYDEE" MURDERERS.—It is seldom that any case of capital crime is attended by circumstances of greater atrocity, than marked the dreadful murder perpetrated on the Haydee by Carlos Magne and Francisco Lazarini, recently executed at Mazatlan. These men belonged to no ordinary class of murderers, and are entitled to a horrible pre eminence among modern criminals. An hour before their execution they were singing and laughing, apparently in excellent spirits and on the way to the place where they were to suffer the penalty of their crime, both were tranquil and undaunted. Magne smoked a cigar all the way to the spot, and, on arriving, the two leaped lightly from the cart with every appearance of cheerful alacrity. The men were sentenced to be shot, and just before the word was given to "fire!" Magne shouted "Vive la France!" in a loud, clear voice. Neither of the criminals was despatched at the first fire, another being necessary to complete the work. The heads of these extraordinary malefactors have been sent to this city embalmed. The heads look as natural as life, with hair, whiskers and teeth, and may be seen by those who are curious in such matters, at DR. JORDAN'S ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.

THE DREAMY SUMMER-TIME.

THE leaves are stilled, the breezes hushed,
Or sing a drowsy number,
And all throughout the silent day
The golden hours slumber.
The ripples idly lapse along
Beneath the noon-tide's gleaming;
Oh, sure the drowsy Summer-time
Was made alone for dreaming.

Within my open window floats
A slumbrous breath of roses,
And in the softly shaded room
Silence itself reposes;
And liquid lustres on the wall
Cool, rippling waves resemble,
As to and fro, with motion slow,
The leafy shadows tremble.

A sense of silence and repose—
Of slow and tranquil motion,
A murmur as of sleeping winds
Upon a sleeping ocean;
And softly o'er my senses steals
A luxury Elysian,
And all delights of drowsy thought
Are mingled in my vision.

Oh, chiding voices, wake me not,
Nor turn my rhyme to reason—
For life is mingled work and play,
And each may have its season.
The Winter-time for study's toil,
The Spring for pleasure's scheming,
Autumn for the poet's thought,
And Summer-time for dreaming!

THE MAN WHO OWNED HE WAS A FOOL.

DR. THEVENET, a distinguished surgeon at Calais, one day received a note without signature, requesting him to repair to a hotel not far off, with such instruments as were necessary for an amputation. Thevenet was somewhat surprised at the manner of the invitation, but concluding that it was the work of some wag, paid no regard to it. Three days after he received a second invitation still more pressing, and containing the information that the next day at nine o'clock a carriage would stop before his house in order to convey him. Thevenet resolved to let the affair take its course, and when, on the following day, at the striking of the clock, an elegant carriage stopped before the door, he seated himself in it, and asked the driver to whom he was to carry him?

The driver replied in English—"What I do not know I cannot tell."

At length the carriage stopped before the door of the hotel. A handsome young man, of about twenty-eight years of age, received the surgeon at the door, and conducted him up stairs into a large chamber, where the following conversation took place:

"You have sent for me?"

"I am much obliged to you for the trouble you have taken to visit me. Here is coffee, chocolate, or wine, if you would take anything before the operation."

"Show me the patient, sir; I must first ascertain whether the injury is such as to render an amputation necessary."

"It is necessary. Doctor, seat yourself; I have perfect confidence in you—listen to me. Here is a purse of one hundred guineas; this is the pay you will receive for the operation. If done successfully, it is yours. Should you refuse to comply with my wishes, see, here is a loaded pistol. You are in my power; I will shoot you."

"Sir, I am not afraid of your pistols. But what is your particular desire? Tell me without preamble."

"You must cut off my right leg."

"With all my heart; and, if you please, your head too. But the leg is sound. You sprang up stairs just now with the agility of a dancing-master. What ails your leg?"

"Nothing. I only want it off."

"Sir, you are a fool."

"Why does that trouble you, Thevenet?"

"What sin has the leg committed?"

"None; but are you ready to take it off?"

"Sir, I do not know. Bring me evidence that you are sound of mind."

"Will you comply with my request?"

"Yes, sir, so soon as you give me sufficient reasons for such mutilation of yourself."

"I cannot tell you the truth, perhaps, for some years; but I will lay a wager that after a certain time you shall understand that my reasons are most noble—that my happiness, my very existence, depend upon my being freed from this leg."

"Sir, I lay no wagers. Tell me your name, residence, family, and occupation."

"You shall know all that hereafter. Do you take me for an honorable man?"

"I cannot. A man of honor does not threaten his physician with pistols. I have duties toward you as a stranger. I will not mutilate you. If you wish to be the murderer of a guiltless father of a family, then shoot."

"Well, Mr. Thevenet, I will not shoot you; but I will force you to take off my leg. What you will not for the love of money, nor the fear of a bullet, you shall do for compassion."

"And how so?"

"I will break my leg by discharging my pistols, and here before your eyes."

The Englishman seated himself, and placed the mouth of the pistol close to his knee. Thevenet was on the point of springing to prevent him, but he exclaimed—

"Stir not, or I fire! Now," said he, "will you increase and lengthen out my pains for nothing?"

"You are a fool," says Thevenet, "but it shall be done. I will take off the unfortunate leg."

The Englishman calmly laid by the pistol, and all was made ready for the operation. As soon as the surgeon began to cut, the Englishman lighted his pipe, and swore it should not go out. He kept his word. The leg lay upon the floor, and the Englishman was still smoking. Thevenet did his work like a master; the wound, by his skill, and the patient's own good nature, was healed at a fixed time. He rewarded the surgeon like a king, and thanked him with tears of joy for the loss of his leg, and sallied over the streets with a wooden one. About eight weeks after his departure, Thevenet received a letter from England with the following contents:

"You will receive enclosed, as a proof of my most heartfelt gratitude, an order for two hundred and fifty guineas upon Mons. Panchard in Paris. You have made me the happiest mortal on earth in depriving me of my leg, for it was the only hindrance to my earthly felicity. Brave man, you may now know the cause of my foolish humor as you called it.

"You concluded, at the time, that there could be no reasonable ground for such self mutilation. I offered to lay a wager; you did well in not accepting it. After my second return from the East Indies, I became acquainted with Emilie Harley, the most perfect of women. I loved her most passionately. Her wealth, her family connections, influenced my friends in her favor; but I was influenced only by her beauty and her noble heart. I joined the number of her admirers. Ah! excellent Thevenet, I was so fortunate as to gain her affections. She loved me above all—made no secret of it—but she still rejected me. I sought her hand in vain; in vain I implored her parents and her friends to intercede for me. She was still immovable. For a long time I was unable to conjecture the cause of her refusing me; since, as she confessed herself, she loved me almost to distraction. One of her visitors at length betrayed to me the secret. Miss Harley was a wonder of beauty, but she had only one leg; and, on account of this imperfection, she feared to become my wife, lest I should esteem her the less for it. My resolution was taken. I resolved to become like her; thanks to you I became so. I came with my wooden leg to London, and in the first place visited Miss Harley. It had been reported, and I myself had written to England, that by a fall from a horse I had broken my leg, which was consequently taken off. It was much regretted. Emilie fell into a swoon the first time she saw me. She was for a long time inconsolable, but now she is my wife. The first day after our marriage I intrusted to her the secret of what a sacrifice I had made in consequence of my wish to obtain her hand. She loves me now the more affectionately. Oh, my brave Thevenet! had I ten legs to lose, I would, without a single contortion of feature, part with them all for my Emilie. So long as I live I will be grateful to you. Come to London—visit us—become acquainted with my wife, and then say I was a fool. "CHARLES TEMPLE, BART."

ANSWER OF DR. THEVENET.

"SIR—I thank you for your valuable present; for so I must call it, because I cannot consider it as reward for the little trouble I was at. I congratulate you on your marriage with a woman so worthy of your affections. It is true a leg is much to lose, even for a beautiful, virtuous, and affectionate wife—but not too much. To gain possession of Eve, Adam was obliged to part with a rib; and beautiful women have cost some men their heads. But, after all, permit me to adhere to my former judgment. Truly, for the moment you were correct, but with this difference; the correctness of my judgment was founded on long experience, as every truth should be, which we are not disposed to acknowledge. Sir, mind me, I lay a wager, that after two years you repent that your leg was taken off above the knee. You will find that below the knee had been enough. After three years you will be convinced that the loss of the foot had been sufficient. After four years, you conclude that the sacrifice of the great toe, and after five years, of the little toe, had been too much. After six years, you will agree with me that the paring of a nail had been enough. But I do not say this in prejudice of the merits of your charming wife. In my youth I devoted myself to love, but I have never parted with a leg. Had I done so, I should, at this day, have said, 'Thevenet, thou wast a fool.'

I have the honor to be, yours, etc., "LEWIS THEVENET."

Eleven years after, during the horrors of the Revolution, Thevenet, whom a person that envied his reputation caused to be suspected of aristocracy, fled to London to save himself from the guillotine. He inquired after Sir Charles Temple, and was shown his house. He made himself known, and was received. In an arm-chair by the fire, surrounded by twenty newspapers, sat a corpulent man, who could hardly stand up, he was so unwieldy.

"Ah, welcome, doctor," cried the corpulent man, who was no other than Sir Charles Temple; "excuse me if I do not rise. This cursed leg is a hindrance to me in everything You have come to see if your judgment was correct."

"I come as a fugitive, and seek your protection."

"You shall have it with pleasure. You must live with me from this day, for truly you are a wise man. You must console me. Surely, Thevenet, probably I had been an admiral of the blue, had not my wooden leg disqualified me from the service of my country. When I read the gazettes, the brown and the blue make me angry, because I can have nothing to do with them. Come, console me."

"Your wife can do that better than I."

"Say nothing of her. Her wooden leg prevented her dancing, so she betook herself to cards and to fashion. There is no such thing as living peaceably with her."

"What! was my judgment correct, then?"

"Oh, welcome, beloved Thevenet; but be silent on the point. It was a silly adventure. Had I my leg again, I would not now give the paring of a nail. Between you and me, I was a fool, but keep this to yourself."

AN ACROBATIC ROBBER.

A FEW nights ago a robbery occurred at the St. Nicholas hotel, New York, which, for boldness and daring, quite outdoes anything since the days of Jack Sheppard, Esq. As I have seen no mention of it in the papers, I will recount it to you as I heard it from one of the hotel guests. A person applied for a room and was shown into a small chamber in the fifth story. Late at night, when all the guests were supposed to be asleep, he clambered out of his window and stood with his feet on the stone coping of the window directly below his own. From this coping he stepped to that of the window adjoining, and carefully opening the window of the room on a line with his own, softly lifted himself into the apartment. Here he robbed the occupant of his watch and pocket-book. From this room he proceeded to the next, and so on until he had entered six rooms. The seventh room was occupied by a lady who was awake, and seeing the figure of a man about entering her window she gave a cry of terror. At that he hastily retreated. The lady sprang from her bed, opened her door and gave an alarm. The night watchmen were soon on the spot, who proceeded to arouse the guests in the adjoining chambers. This required some moments, and when at last the rooms were successively entered no clue to the whereabouts of the robber could be discovered. But the occupants of several of the rooms found they had been robbed. One man found his pocket-book emptied of money, but with a check in one of the departments which did not belong to him. This check was claimed by another of the victims, the robber having deliberately carried the check from the pocket-book of one gentleman to that of another, possibly with the idea of exciting suspicion toward the wrong person. The watchmen in arousing the guests were delayed exceedingly long at one room, and, when at last admitted into the apartment, they found the bed untouched and the occupant partly dressed, who explained that he had taken a pillow and lain upon the floor. This circumstance excited suspicion, and it was determined to watch him closely until morning, when the affair would be thoroughly investigated. But when the morning came, notwithstanding the fact that every egress from the hotel had been closely watched, it was found that the suspected person had disappeared. The nerve and reckless daring of a man who could at night walk along the narrow coping of windows five stories high is certainly quite unparalleled.—N. Y. Correspondent Boston Gazette.

THE LATE COUNT BACCIOCHI.

"SPIRIDION," in a recent letter from Paris to the Boston Gazette, mentions the cause of the death of the Count Bacciochi. "He was born in Ajaccio in 1803. After the fall of the empire and the ruin of his kindred he lived in Italy, leading the life of a wealthy gentleman. When Prince Louis Napoleon was elected president of the republic, Count Bacciochi came to France. When the empire was proclaimed he was appointed grand chamberlain and superintendent of the imperial theatres. He was attacked in 1856 by a nervous disease which affected the organs of motion. His tortures these last ten years have been indescribable. He could only sleep when thoroughly exhausted. He could never sit down, nor could he stand still, as he himself used to say: 'I am like the Wandering Jew. On, on, on! is the cry disease constantly whispers in my ears!' He had become so accustomed to walking, it at last became almost impossible for him to superinduce the fatigues required to overcome pain by sleep. It was rare, indeed, he could sleep before three or four o'clock in the morning, and when sleep did at last come it never lingered long. He walked constantly; even at the opera his box was latticed and thick carpets were spread on the floor that he might walk while listening to the music, and kill the hours which lay between dinner and midnight. When he returned home he was obliged to begin again his walk. The emperor had one of the longest galleries of the palace of the Tuileries covered with thick carpets that his wretched chamberlain might incessantly walk up and down it. During one crisis he walked thirty-six hours without stopping once, and when he did halt to be borne exhausted to bed the soles of his feet were injected with blood which seemed to issue from every pore! He died from the exhaustion brought on by want of sleep, which our doctors were unable to superinduce, for he had at last taken narcotics in such quantities that the most potent of them had no effect whatever on him.

GLIMPSES OF EMINENT PERSONS.

JEAN INGELOW.

"WILL you come and call on Jean Ingelow?" said my hostess, one fine day.

Of course I would; so away we went along a shady lane, with the old oaks of Holland Park on one side and the ivy-covered walls of Aubury House on the other; for, though a part of London, Notting Hill is rich in gardens, lawns, and parks, such as one sees only in England. Our way led us by Kensington Palace, the residences of Addison, the Duke of Argyle, Macaulay, and, better than all the rest to me, the house of Thackeray. A low, long brick house, covered with ivy to the chimney-top; a sunny bit of lawn in front, trees and flowers all about; and, though no longer haunted by the genial presence of its former master, this unpretending place is to many eyes more attractive than any palace in the land. I looked long and lovingly at it, feeling a strong desire to enter its hospitably open door, recalling with ever fresh delight the evening spent in listening to the lecture on Swift, long ago in America, and experiencing again the sense of heavy loss which came to me with the tidings that the novelist whom I most loved and admired would never write again. Leaving my tribute of affection and respect in a look, a smile, and a sigh, I gathered a leaf of ivy as a relic, and went on my way.

Coming at last to a quiet street, where all the houses were gay with window-boxes full of flowers, we reached Miss Ingelow's. In the drawing-room we found the mother of the poetess, a truly beautiful old lady, in widow's cap and gown with the sweetest, serenest face I ever saw. Two daughters sat with her, both older than I had fancied them to be, but both very attractive women. Eliza looked as if she wrote the poetry, Jean the prose—for the former wore curls, had a delicate face, fine eyes, and that indescribable something which suggests genius; the latter was plain, rather stout, hair touched with gray, shy, yet cordial manners, and a clear, straightforward glance, which I liked so much that I forgave her on the spot for writing those dull stories.

Gerald Massey was with them, a dapper little man, with a large, fine head, and very un-English manners. Being oppressed with "the mountainous me," he rather bored the company with "my poems, my plans, and my publishers," till Miss Eliza politely devoted herself to him, leaving my friend to chat with the lovely old lady, and myself with Jean. Both being bashful, and both laboring under the delusion that it was proper to allude to each other's works, we tried to exchange a few compliments, blushed, hesitated, laughed, and wisely took refuge in a safer subject. Jean had been abroad; so we pleasantly compared notes, and I enjoyed the sound of her peculiarly musical voice, in which I seemed to hear the breezy rythm of some of her charming songs. The ice which surrounds every English man and woman was beginning to melt, when Massey disturbed me to ask what was thought of his books in America. As I really had not the remotest idea, I said so; whereat he looked blank, and fell upon Longfellow, who seems to be the only one of our poets whom the English know or care much about. The conversation became general, and soon it was necessary to leave, lest the safety of the nation should be endangered by overstepping the fixed limits of a morning call.

Later, I learned that Miss Ingelow was extremely conservative, and was very indignant when a petition for women's right to vote was offered for her signature. A rampant radical told this, and shook her handsome head pathetically over Jean's narrowness; but when I heard that once a week several poor souls dined comfortably in the pleasant home of the poetess, I forgave her conservatism, and regretted that an unconquerable aversion to dinner-parties made me decline her invitation.

GEORGE ELIOT.

Having an intense desire to see the author of "Adam Bede," we drove to the Priory one Sunday, hoping that a peep might be vouchsafed me. To my great disappointment, however, Mrs. Lewes was too feeble to see a stranger; so, while my friend went in for a moment, I was forced to content myself with admiring the laburnums and wisterias that fringed the garden-walls with plumes of violet and gold, and wonder in which of the pleasant looking rooms the last book had been written, for "Felix Holt" was just finished, and its author preparing to seek rest and health at the German baths. When Mrs. T—— returned, Mr. Lewes accompanied her, and, while he lingered a moment, I took a woman's look at him under cover of my veil. A small, plain man, with keen blue eyes, marks of suffering in his face, and charmingly courteous manners.

As we drove home I asserted my Yankee privilege of asking questions; and, as the facts I then learned are no secret, I repeat them here. Mr. Lewes, having forgiven and received back an unfaithful wife, cannot, according to English law, obtain a divorce, although the wife has twice deserted him. Miss Evans is considered his wife, and called Mrs. Lewes by their friends, in spite of gossip and scandal. Owing to her peculiar position, Mrs. Lewes seldom goes into general society or sees strangers, though every one is anxious to meet her, and many of her warmest friends are among the wise and good. All whom I saw loved, respected, and defended her; some upon the plea that, if genius, like charity, covers a multitude of sins in men, why not in women? Others, that outsiders know so little of the sorrowful story that they cannot judge the ease; and, though they may condemn the act, they can pity the actors, and heartily admire all that is admirable in the life and labor of either.

MISS COBBE.

As I sat pouring over Gustave Dore's illustrations of Dante one morning, the door suddenly flew open, and in rolled an immensely stout lady, with skirts kilted up, a cane in her hand, a fly-away green bonnet on her head, and a loud laugh issuing from her lips, as she cast herself upon a sofa, exclaiming breathlessly:

"Me dear creature, if ye love me, a glass of sherry!"

The wine being ordered, I was called from my nook, and introduced to Miss Cobbe. I had imagined the author of Intuitive Morals to be a serious, severe lady, of the "Cornelia Blimber" school, and was much surprised to see this merry, witty, Falstaffian personage. For half an hour she entertained us with all manner of droll sayings, as full of sense as of humor, one minute talking earnestly and gravely on the suffrage question, which just then absorbed the circle in which I found myself, the next criticising an amateur poem in a way that convulsed her hearers, and in the middle of it jumping up to admire a picture, or trot about the room, enthusiastically applauding some welcome bit of news about "our petition." Cheery, sensible, kindly, and keen she seemed; and when she went away, talking hard till out of the gate, and vanishing with a hearty laugh, it was as if a great sunbeam had left the room, so genial and friendly was the impression she made. I saw her several times afterward, and always found her the same. Wherever she was, people gathered about her, as if she was a social fire, and every one seemed to find warmth and pleasure in the attractive circle which surrounded her. It was truly delightful to see a woman so useful, happy wise, and beloved; and it confirmed still more my belief that single women are a valuable and honorable portion of the human race, in spite of the sneers at "old maids" and lamentations over their unhappy lot.

MISS GARRETT.

Another interesting spinster whom it was my good fortune to meet was the female doctor who is conquering prejudices as successfully in London as Drs. Blackwell and Zakrreuska are in New York and Boston. Hearing Miss Garrett announced at an evening party, I looked up, expecting to see an elderly person, but was agreeably disappointed when down the long drawing-room advanced a slender, golden-haired young lady, dressed with a taste which few English women possess. She could only stay a few minutes, as a patient was waiting for her; and it was curious to hear this girlish little creature in white silk talk of her practice, her office, and the daily work she did. Very simply and naturally she spoke of these things to her friend, and expressed such hearty love for her work, such confidence in its success, and such satisfaction in her daily increasing power to help and comfort, that, though I never met her again, I shall always remember with real pleasure this little glimpse of a woman who bravely took her life into her own hands, and, in spite of ridicule and opposition, dared to shape it as she would, and, so far, make of it a beautiful success.

MATILDA BLIND.

Under the blooming apple-boughs at Wimbledon I met the sister of Ferdinand Blind. A handsome, brilliant, Bettine-like girl, full of talent, energy, and enthusiasm. The pet of Mazzini, the friend of Browning, an ardent admirer of Gœthe, and a hearty hater of Bismarck. She approved of her brother's deed, considered him a martyr, and gloried in him as a hero, refusing to lament his death as others did, but taking pride in it with a stern sort of satisfaction, such as a Roman girl might have felt at some brave act of friend or lover. To me she was very charming on account of the many peculiarities to which others objected. Simple and frank as a child in manner, the wit and wisdom of her conversation struck one all the more strongly by the force of contrast, for she talked fluently and well on many subjects which few girls care even to hear of. Entirely unconscious of herself, she sat in the grass, idly pulling daisies, as she discussed Emerson, Carlyle, Kant, Gœthe, English politics, and German wars, with a sense and spirit that amazed me and made other girls seem like pretty dolls beside an earnest woman, with heart and soul all alive to the great questions of the world.

On another occasion I met her in London, and enjoyed a lively argument between herself and three or four young barristers on the subject of poetry. They were sensible fellows, well read, in good training for argument, and as enthusiastic as it was possible for Englishmen to be on any purely ideal subject; yet Matilda Blind not only astonished, charmed, and out-argued them, but convinced them that there was something finer in poetry than they had ever suspected before, and unconsciously gave them a sample of a kind which can never be put into words. We were at dinner when she came in, but long after the dessert was over we still sat on, too astonished to care for lights, though summer twilight soon hid the faces of the disputants from one another. One by one the young men fell silent; and we sat in the dusk, listening to the girl's eloquent voice, as she repeated fine lines from Shakspeare, Milton, Gœthe, Coleridge, and Schiller, with a dramatic power that charmed us all. Whenever she paused, some one eagerly said, "Please go on;" and she did go on, illustrating her theme with marvelous skill and beauty, holding us till late into the evening, and causing the whole party to volunteer as an escort when she left.

It was a moonlight night, and I walked with her a part of the way home, answering her questions about America, and hearing some of her pranks, which were decidedly of the Bettine order. She liked the freedom of her own country better than England, and said she was continually shocking some excellent person by doing what she liked, regardless of the strict rules set down for the guidance of young ladies.

"I desired to visit Switzerland when more young than now," she said in her prettily broken English. "I took a friend to protect me, but we soon wearied of each other; I sent her home, and then I was greatly content. Ah, such adventures, all alone in a strange country; a girl, and so little! I spent my money, I lost my luggage, people thought me mad at home, and everything was so droll. Then I had a little fear, and was suddenly wise; I sent for money, and redeemed my luggage; went home, and asked pardon for my prank. But it was fine, I liked it well, and I shall go again. My life often becomes heavy to me; but I make freedom for myself, and so endure it. Wait a little, it may yet come to some good; for I have gifts, if I can only learn to use them."

As she pressed my hand at parting with a strong, warm grasp, I could not doubt that the life of this richly-gifted girl, would come to some good, and I hopefully wait to hear of Matilda Blind.—Louisa M. Alcott in the N. Y. Independent.

SAW THE ELEPHANT DOUBLE.

JOSEPH GREEN was brought in for having been inebriated and asleep in the highway. He had been having an evening's amusement, in the course of which he had been to the circus, and afterward to a bowling alley and shooting gallery, with a friend whom he had picked up. By the kind permission of the judge he was allowed to tell his story in his own way, which he did in a very disjointed style, and with a great deal of earnestness and volubility, somewhat after the fashion of the well-known Alfred Jingle.

"My name is Green, Mr. Judge; live in the country; come to town for the first time to see the city; stop at Mr. Aster's tavern in Broadway street; fine place; good bar-tender, big whiskers, does things with a kind of flourishing jerk peculiar to himself; didn't know anybody in the city; perfect stranger; got my supper; went out on the steps, man came along—good looking man; shiny hat, big chains, stand up collar, cane with a jack-knife in, introduced himself; said he was a perfect stranger too; wanted me to go with him and pass a pleasant evening; agreed to go; took something to drink before we started; got a little ways and he said hadn't we better take a nip; took a nip; he said shouldn't we go to the circus; told him wasn't acquainted with the circus, but trot it out; he said hadn't we better have something first; had something; got to the door; my friend had left his pocket-book at home; borrowed ten dollars and paid for two; gave me the change, a one dollar bill, three pewter dimes, and a smooth cent; didn't understand York currency, but thought it all right; got inside; place near the door with bottles in, also glasses and pumps—large assortment of pumps with mahogony handles; friend said, "should we smile?" we smiled; stepped along and looked at the performance; men with nothing on but a crown and a pair of tight breeches covered over with sixpences, and woman with pettieoats about as long as a turnover collar, all standing on one leg on horseback, except when they were rolling head over heels in sawdust, trying to catch the tips of their toes in their teeth; remarkable fact, all the horses had two tails, and all the men were double-headers; friend said it was the effect of the last smile, and proposed that we should take something to get the dust out of our eyes—friend said if I'd seen enough we'd go—took a last look—the men with the sixpenny breeches were dancing with the ladies in short shirts, which seemed all upside down, like a bowl—man with a whip—was cracking it at everybody, especially a fellow with three cornered patches all over him, who was standing on his head on a pewter platter, on top of a pair of stilts—stopped at the place with the bottles in—friend said should we imbibe—we imbibed—went outside, started to go across the street, brought up against an oyster cart, tried to kick over an oyster cart, got my leg between the wheels—new hat fell off—couldn't get up, concluded to sit down—did sit down in my hat—friend helped me up and tied my hat on with a string—friend said shouldn't we take a snifter—took a snifter—went to a shooting-place—tried to kill the cast-iron man with a pipe in his mouth—don't think I did—fired seven times, and all the balls lodged in the ceiling overhead, except one, which went through the toe of my boot and stuck in the floor; friend said hadn't we better horn—horned; started for bowling saloon; got part way; friend proposed that we should stop at milk punch place and take a suck—took a suck; got to rolling place; thought I'd roll the first ball; didn't stay on the alley; the second I let slip behind me, and it smashed a bird-cage and demolished a canary; while the last one hit the pin boy and knocked him through the side of the house; friend said shouldn't we go to the bar and 'Let 'em up,' and kept doing so till the floor looked like a river, and tried to drink the coal hod under the impression that it was a glass of brandy and sugar, hot; friend said shouldn't we julep—juleped; he then proposed that we should cocktail—cocktailed; friend borrowed my pocket-book and coat, officer came, and here I am."

Mr. Green was reprimanded and discharged, further punishment being considered unnecessary, in consideration of his loss while seeing the elephant.—New York Paper.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1866.

BLACK SHEEP.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued in to-day's CALIFORNIAN.

RESTING ON AUTHORITY — M. GUIZOT ON FREEDOM OF DISCUSSION.

WHEN a layman, distinguished for learning and ability, comes forward as the champion of Christianity, his unprofessional testimony naturally carries with it a greater weight than that of the theologian who is committed, or retained in the case, and whose duty and business it is supposed to be to act on a particular side just as it is the business and duty of an advocate who has accepted a brief. And indeed, it is not to be denied that a large proportion of the "reasoning" to be found in sermons, and treatises written by professional theologians partakes of the nature of special pleading, and that a style of argument seems to be admissible in theology which could not pass muster in any severe legal tribunal, or in scientific or philosophical discussion. Hence, when learned laymen of the intellectual calibre and lofty personal character of Mr. Gladstone, or Chevalier Bunsen, or M. Guizot, enter the field of religious discussion, they are sure to obtain a wider audience and a more respectful attention from men of the world, and from all students and thinkers outside of the church, than any clergyman though equally gifted and equally able, could hope to command. And even among those who are within the pale, such names carry the weight of a disinterested and unprofessional authority, and their adhesion is hailed with enthusiasm. Accordingly, M. Guizot's recent volume on "The Present State of the Christian Religion," has been more widely reviewed in the French and English periodicals, and more copiously quoted by them, than any unsensational book on a similar subject that has appeared for years: for whatever may be the value of the reasoning it contains, it is in itself a conclusive argument in proof of the fact that notwithstanding all the boasted triumphs of modern science, and modern philosophical speculation, there are minds of the first order trained in the atmosphere of secular pursuits that still adhere with the deepest and most unshaken conviction to the doctrines of Revealed Religion.

Notwithstanding the venerable sneer about pinning one's faith to some one else's sleeve, the vast majority of men do and must believe many things simply upon authority. Indeed we may safely go further, and affirm the same thing of men universally, excepting only those who are so defective intellectually, as to believe nothing. How many, for example, of those who implicitly accept the ordinary statements concerning the period in which the earth traverses its orbit, the distances from our planet of the Sun, the Moon and the other planets respectively, the rate at which light and sound respectively travel, are capable of verifying these statements for themselves, or even of comprehending the reasonings and the processes by which their accuracy is established? When the geographers assure us that Killimandjaro is twenty thousand feet high, and that one of the peaks of the Himmelayas is seven or eight thousand feet higher, we do not refuse our assent on the ground that we have not ourselves measured the base lines, and taken the angles and worked out all the trigonometrical calculations necessary to arrive at the result; and when a passenger at sea, who does not understand logorithms and cannot take an observation, relies upon the captain's calculations for the latitude and longitude, what does he do, but pin his faith to the navigator's sleeve?

Such cases are not, it is true, strictly analogous to that of religious belief; but so far as the impracticability of each individual's verifying every dogma he accepts by independent investigation, and declining to accept anything upon authority—so far as this, it is complete. For it is, to say the least, quite as much out of the question for the masses of mankind to make any really thorough and independent examination of the fundamental questions of philosophy and religion, as it is for them to measure the heights and distances of inaccessible objects or to make abstruse astronomical calculations.

If we take for instance such critical questions as those debated by the learned Renan on the one side, and the at least equally learned Dr. Dollinger and M. de Pressense on the other; such philosophico religious questions as are presented in the examinations of Auguste Compte's system by Martineau and Guizot, where intellects equally powerful trained and furnished are brought to the encounter; or such scientific-philosophical questions going to the very foundation of all religious belief, as arise between Dr. Buchner, the great champion of modern Materialism, and M. Janet his most formidable and searching critic—if we come to such questions as these, there is not one layman in a thousand, nor one professional theologian in a hundred, who is competent to investigate and pronounce upon them independently.

Hence the instinctive respect for authority which is a part of our nature is not to be regarded as a weakness; on the other hand the blustering assertion of the right of individual judgment, except so far as it is accompanied by individual fitness and capacity to examine the grounds of judgment, is merely the bravado of thoughtlessness and folly.

To those whose instincts incline to belief, but who, looking abroad upon the raging sea of modern speculation, feel with dismay that the old foundations are threatened, it is a perfectly legitimate source of comfort and confidence to see that the boast of learned and scientific skeptics that all the learning and science and secular ability of the age is outside of the Church, and openly or secretly rejects her teachings, is a vain and false one.

But the time has now manifestly come, when believers must be content to meet their opponents on the open field of intellectual combat. The thinker who assails Belief in a purely philosophic spirit cannot be put down by the cry of "infidel," or "atheist." Investigation, critical, scientific, speculative, however freely and boldly conducted, should subject no man to the odium theologicum. Such is evidently M. Guizot's opinion. While he says that impatience of an old yoke, the spirit of reaction, a thirst for innovation, together with many frivolous instincts and evil passions, have a large part in the attacks made in our day against Christianity, he at the same time feels constrained to admit that "a sentiment much more serious, the love of truth for herself alone, whatever may be the perils and whatever the results," has inspired some of those who are among the most formidable enemies of Belief.*

M. Guizot does not shrink from placing the cause of Christianity upon an intellectual basis. He thinks that in an age like this, there is but one way in which the champions of religion can successfully encounter its enemies, and that is not by denouncing them for their unbelief, but by convicting them of false philosophy. The mass of believers cannot enter into such conflicts, but their great leaders must not shrink from them. Let human science, says M. Guizot in substance, its labors and its systems be subjected to the same critical tests, and handled with the same freedom with which the foundations of the Christian faith have been examined by its opponents, and Christianity can fairly demand no more; nor need it dread the result of such a trial, provided it fearlessly accepts the conditions, and in its turn imposes them rigidly upon its adversaries.†

*L'impatience d'un ancien joug, l'esprit de reaction, le goût de l'innovation, beaucoup d'instincts frivoles et de mauvaises passions ont, à coup sûr, leur part, et une large part, dans les attaques dont le christianisme est aujourd'hui l'objet; mais un sentiment plus serieux que ceux-lá, un sentiment qui a fait des heros et des martyrs, l'amour de la verite, pour elleméme et pour elle seule, quels que soient ses perils et ses resultats, c'est lá le fait qui donne á ces attaques leur plus redoutable caractere.

HOW FAR ARE "CELEBRITIES" PUBLIC PROPERTY?

IF there is any treason in that species of gossip in print about the appearance, conversation, and personal peculiarities of literary or social celebrities, in which N. P. Willis indulged so freely some twenty years ago after his return from England, it is at least certain that the proportion of those who "love the treason," is far greater than that of those who "despise the traitor." The taste for "crayons of distinguished persons" seems to be general and ineradicable; it is therefore natural, and within certain bounds innocent. It is only where it contracts a morbid taint, a relish for prying into secrets, for invading a guarded and sacred privacy, for gloating over dark surmises and whispered scandals, that it becomes despicable and vile. Yet it is no easy task to draw a distinct line which shall indicate with precision the boundary between the legitimate and the illegitimate in this popular species of literature. It may be said in general terms that public men are fair subjects of this kind of personal gossip; and this will not probably be questioned so far as their public acts and characters are concerned. The correspondent or the author who goes into the gallery of the House of Commons, and sketches Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Disraeli, even to the cut of the garments and the mole on the left cheek, transgresses no canon of propriety; but should he meet those distinguished men at a private dinner party, or obtain an interview in the ordinary routine of society, and then use them as so much literary capital by publishing their conversation, he would be guilty of a gross offence against the spirit of the social code. The sins charged against Mr. Willis, were of this latter description, and by his English censors they were held to be wholly unpardonable. A broader charge, and one which is not we fear altogether without foundation, has been made, to the effect that American travelers in general have a strong proclivity to offend in this respect.

Certain it is that the American public has evinced a peculiar relish for that species of literature the staple of which consists of gossipping personalities, and as a natural consequence, the demand produces the supply. Americans traveling abroad and corresponding for journals at home know very well that letters containing no elements but information and judicious comment, would not be considered as constituting a particularly attractive feature, while personal sketches, of the description of those furnished by Miss Alcott to the New York Independent, of which some specimens will be found on another page of our present issue, are sure to be eagerly devoured. Though Miss Alcott certainly belongs to the better class of lion-sketching correspondents, she does not hesitate, as will be seen, to retail conversations which she heard while making private visits, or to hold up to ridicule old and intimate friends of families into which she was admitted for the first time, such ridicule being predicated upon the remarks and deportment of said old and intimate friends as witnessed by the American stranger during her visit. When we read Miss Alcott's account of her morning call upon Jean Ingelow, and of what took place there, and how she snubbed Gerald Massey, the friend of the family, and see with what naive conceit she put herself upon a level of perfect literary equality with the celebrated poetess, we cannot but think that George Eliot acted very prudently in declining to receive her American visitor, nor can we feel the least surprise that American travelers of literary proclivities encounter so much reserve in the better circles of English society.

LOCAL ART ITEMS.

ANOTHER water color drawing, by William Keith, has made its appearance in the window of Snow & Roos' establishment. It represents Tamalpais as seen from near the Mission of San Rafael on a warm autumnal day—

> "When all the winds are still,
> And twinkle in the smoky light the waters of the rill."

The large redwood trees in the foreground are well executed, and the general effect of the masses of foliage is very good. A warm haze enshrouds the forest at the foot hills, and imparts an additional wildness to the dim forms of the withered pines that stand like sentries watching the valley below. The mountain itself is robed in the same misty covering, through which, however, some lights and shadows are perceptible.

The picture on the whole is a very pleasing one and highly creditable to the young artist, who will, we hope, be induced to bring more of his productions before the public.

Denny exhibits a large sea view with a lengthy title in the window of one of our clothing establishments. The painting is decidedly inferior to many of his former pictures, and possesses too little either in design or execution, distinguishing it from hundreds of similar marine views with which our counting-rooms are hung, to render it especially worthy of notice. A dull sky, a dull sea, and a dull vessel, are all indifferently painted; and the utter lack of animation in drawing and of brilliancy in coloring, conveys to the beholder a feeling of relief to know that the ship is "inward" rather than "outward bound."

A few portraits, by McClellan, are exhibited at Snow & Roos' gallery. They are fairly painted and quite well drawn; but still the drawing is very conventional, and the flesh tints untrue. In these days of beautiful photography, oil portraits need, more than formerly, something of the ideal to render them attractive or desirable; and the artist who draws most upon his imagination will meet with the best success. The camera has rendered portrait painting too mechanical, however, to satisfy the artist, and we shall hardly look for another Reynolds or Stuart in our day.

More Moonshine Wanted.

It is useless to beg the Board of Supervisors to make arrangements for the lighting of the streets of San Francisco. They insist that when the moon rises it illuminates the city. The honorable Board maintain that if the moon is bidden by clouds, and consequently the city is wrapped in thick darkness, it is not their fault. In order to save the money of the city, they made a contract with a gas company for a supply of light at such times as the almanac stated that the moon would be otherwise engaged, and consequently be unable to attend to its special duty of lighting San Francisco. Had the Board of Supervisors, at the time they granted this contract, remembered that a shower of stars was calculated to take place on the thirteenth of November they would have given the gas company instructions to extinguish all the street lamps on that night, and have insisted on a proportionate reduction being made in the terms of the contract. At present the gas company who have contracted to light the streets of this city, are by the terms of their contract, as we understand it, allowed to extinguish their lamps at the hour the moon rises. The gas company care not how thick the clouds may be which hide the moon from sight; the eye of faith can pierce those clouds; they know there is a moon. The moon has risen. These worshipers of the great eternal light will not insult bright Luna with their shabby attempts at illumination. The gas is put out and during many dark hours before dawn the city is left unilluming. Now the printers who have worked all night plod homeward through darkened streets, splashing through sloughs of mud, and stepping, over ancle-deep, in many a pool which no ray of light points out to their view. The morning newspaper carrier, proceeding to his work, which must commence before daylight, is in as sad a plight. Now the burglar attempts to effect an entrance into a house; let others make hay while the sun shines, he must make money when the moon does not shine, and the economical city of San Francisco cannot afford artificial light to supply the lack of moonshine Should he be observed by a policeman, escape is easy, he can plunge into the surrouning darkness, and if he gains a few feet in advance of his pursuer, he becomes invisible.

Yesterday morning the lamps were extinguished shortly after 1 o'clock in most parts of the city. The darkness was so thick that it was impossible for the eye to pierce it more than four or five feet. It is terrible to contemplate the state San Francisco will be in during the early hours of the morning, unless kind Heaven supplies us more liberally with moonshine. If we can but have the moon during the Winter we can dispense with the summer moon, but with mud beneath, rain above, and darkness surrounding all, San Francisco is a terrible place for early risers, and those who consume the midnight oil.

Capital vs. Labor.

The laboring classes of California would probably not generally realize how terribly they are ground down, oppressed and crushed by the tyranny of wealth unless they were constantly reminded of the fact by public speakers. Mrs. Laura Cuppy, last Sunday evening, sent home many a working man with his heart filled with bitter hatred of his employers, who were, simply because they were rich, so much better off than he was. It is very sad that every one cannot be rich. Of course every one deserves to be. Mrs. Cuppy drew a sad picture of the degraded position occupied by the working man in California. She said: "In view of the steady continuation of such a life of drudgery, it was even a wonder that he was aware of the existence of his soul. They were but the tools and instruments used by the wealthy in securing luxuries and superfluities. At present wealth seemed to secure the monopoly of all the benefits arising to humanity from modern discoveries in art and science."

Some one asked Mrs. Cuppy how it was that wealth tyrannized over the poor so terribly when the latter class constituted a large majority. The lecturess replied, that while she had been in this city she had heard it intimated that wealth could buy votes; that with necessities of a family bearing upon him, many a needy laborer was compelled to cringe to the golden rod, in the hands of his wealthy employer.

Oh! this is an awful state of things. After Mrs. Laura Cuppy has made a few more speeches the condition of the working man will be wonderfully improved. It is not, however, only hard fisted laborers and greasy mechanics who are oppressed by the moneyed men. The literary men of the city are in the same terrible condition of poverty and degradation, according to Mrs. Cuppy. She said: "Even certain influential journals, known as highly conservative, opposed to the cause she advocated, and in the hands of capitalists, while luring the mentality by which their sheets were kept alive, kept those same brains in a state of miserable subjection, and threatening them with the deprivation of their bread and butter, should they dare to give utterance to the brilliant and noble ideas with which their brains teemed."

Unhappy wretches! Miserable slaves! We expect that Fitz Smythe is daily threatened with the deprivation of his bread and butter by the proprietors of the Alta if he gives utterance to many of the brilliant and noble ideas with which his brain teems. Perhaps that is the reason that so few editors give utterance to brilliant and noble ideas. Poor subjected brains! Wretchedly enslaved mentality! Happy Mrs. Cuppy, who makes her bread and butter by giving utterance to ideas which would, if written by these hapless slaves of the quill, subject them to the deprivation of theirs.

A Model Department.

The Paid Fire Department is to be a very different affair from the old rowdy affair.

Rule 27 declares that "no cards, dice, or other articles used for gaming shall be brought into or suffered to remain in any building used by any company of the Paid Fire Department; nor shall any spirituous liquors be used therein or used while working at fires or returning from the same."

The new Department is to be a kind of a branch of the Temperance Legion, and is at the same time, as far as possible, to run an opposition to the Young Men's Christian Association.

Rule 29 says: "No officer or member shall use profane, immoral or indecent language in or about the engine, hose, or book and ladder houses, or while going to or returning from a fire."

The new firemen are to be models of propriety, and an odor of sanctity will hang round an engine house. In future, when a young man is required by the proprietor of a genteel private boarding house to give references, it will be sufficient for him to state that he is a member of the Fire Department. We shall see advertisements setting forth that "a young man of strictly temperate, quiet habits, wishes to obtain rooms and board in a religious family. The advertiser is a foreman and a member of the Methodist Church." There will, we fear, be a few black sheep among this flock of lambs. These will, however, be forced to wait until the engine is housed before they can drink spirits, and must wait until they are away from the engine house before they can discharge the load of profanity which has accumulated in their breasts during the time they were engaged in putting out the fire. These rules are very good, and we trust that they will be carried out. It would be rather a good plan if the rule about swearing and using indecent language were adopted and carried out by the Police Department. Policemen should not be allowed to swear, while on duty, any more than firemen, and yet it would be hard to find one member of the police force who has ever arrested an obstreperous drunk without pouring forth a volley of oaths. "Order and decorum" are to be the strong points of the Paid Fire Department; and even while extinguishing a rude boisterous fire, "decorum" must be observed. We hope that the new department, while it is decorous, will as effectually save property from fire as did the noisy, bold enthusiastic Volunteers.

Horse-racing in California.

Vast sums are spent annually in England, France, and other nations of Europe, on raising race-horses. Royalty encourages racing in England as instituted for "the purpose of improving the breed of horses." This is the fiction which the practical money making Englishman has invented for the purpose of excusing to himself the extravagant outlay attendant on this amusement. The fact of the matter is, that in England, speed in a horse cannot, to any very great degree, be made practically valuable. A race-horse is an article of luxery, and there are about as many in England as are wanted. The fox-hunter, of course, wants a hunter with a little racing blood in him, and the swell's riding-horse often comes of good racing stock.

In America, where the class that spend money are less numerous than in England, running horses are not bred to any great extent. A trotter is an animal that can be put to practical use instead of being run two or three times in a season, and then put in a stable to eat his head off in expenses attendant on his care. Let New York breed its trotting horses, not because a trotting race is as beautiful a sight as a running race, but because it cannot afford to indulge in the extravagance of such useless animals as running horses.

We in California are situated differently. This is the country of all others in the world where horse-racing should be encouraged. We can raise thousands of race horses, and turn them all to practical account. Trotting is slow compared to running. Running races with jockeys in bright caps and jackets, astride splendid horses with no complicated arrangement of bars, straps, and buckles to hide their fine forms, would please the eye of the ladies far better than the trotting race which they nearly all pronounce "dull." When we have reared running-horses by hundreds, then we can send them into the cow counties where they will be found none too fast for the use of the vaquero.

New York has lately established a club for the purpose of encouraging horse-racing and elevating it to a respectable position in that city. Let San Francisco have her club for the purpose of giving running races every season; she can, for the reason above stated, afford to do this better than New York can to raise trotters.

The China Mail and Flying Dragon.

F. Marriott announces that he will, on the 1st of January next, publish the first number of a paper entitled the California China Mail and Flying Dragon, printed both in English and Chinese. The most important announcement in the prospectus published, is the following:

"The California China Mail is designed to be a great Commercial and Industrial medium between America and Asia, to open the avenue of business intercommunication between California on the one hand, and China, Cochin China, Japan, New Zealand, Australia, Burmah, Siam, Malacca, the Philippine Islands, the Dutch Colonies, Singapore, and the Indian Empire, on the other. Thus, opening the way for an interchange of commodities and of business information and ideas between the Eastern and Western Worlds, it will aid in the great work of bringing an Oriental population of not less than 350,000,000 into direct commercial relations with the American Continent."

As Mr. Marriott's Avitor, or steam flying machine will, if all goes well, be in successful operation by the 1st of January, we do not understand why he should advertise that the China Mail and Flying Dragon will be "ready for the steamer Colorado." He will find the Avitor very useful in distributing copies of his paper. It can start on the morning of publication and drop a few China Dragons in China, then steam off to Cochin China, Japan, New Zealand, and the other places, and return to Clay street in the evening. If the Avitor is completed to-morrow and takes its first flight on Monday, the Colorado will, of course, be immediately withdrawn, and the California China Mail and Chinese Dragon will be conveyed by the air line of Avitors.

Reply to Mr. Snort.

Misther Editer:

SIR:—In yer paper of last wake me attintion was called to a lether from a ruffinly blackguard who signed himself "Jefferson Snort," and it is to the same that I desoire with yer kind permission to reply. Yer corrispondent exprisses the opinion that the thrue object of the Fayuians is to subjugate Americu and establish the Catholic religion in the United States, and that the liberation of Ireland is nothing but a blind. The foolish lether to which I refer, was written before the arrival of the late glorious news of the uprising in Ireland, and possibly the poor blind prejudiced crayture who wrote it has by this time opened his benoighted eyes to the thruth. If he has not I would suggest to him to indiver to obtain some informashun concerning the subjects upon which he undertakes to discoorse before vinturing into print. The iday that the Faynians is fightin' the battles of the Church that has refused thim whan living admission to the same on St. Patherick's day, and burial in consicrated ground whan dead, is supramely ridiculus. As to the rights of furriners in Ameriky, I howld them aquil to the rights of the native born. For was not Christhopher Columbus himself the discover of the continent—was not he a furriner himself?

Yours respectfully, MICHAEL O'WHACKERTY.

Cruelty to Animals.

The Flag recently published a thrilling item, worked up in regular old-fashioned melo-dramatic, ultra-sensational style, recounting a pathetic, moving, monstrous and horrible case of cruelty to animals that occurred at the Potrero, where the work upon a new section of railway is going forward. The Flag's informant is said to be a benevolent and tender-hearted old lady who resides in the vicinity and keeps a sharp look-out (with an opera glass) on the teamsters in the employ of the contractor. This venerable female is a firm believer in moral suasion, not only in dealing with biped, but also with quadrupeds. She is shocked at the idea of using whips as an assistant or stimulating motive power for accelerating the speed of horses. Her theory is that if a horse won't 'pull,' the only legitimate mode of overcoming the difficulty is to allure him onward by a bundle of hay held a foot or two before him. Meantime she maintains a vigilant watch upon the proceedings of the Contractor and his men, and sends a daily bulletin to the Flag embracing all her more important discoveries.

An Apology.

The progress of civilization in Oregon is an interesting topic. The editors of that State, long celebrated for their habit of exchanging complimentary epithets that evinced a rare and unique genius for vituperation, have now become sufficiently civilized to adopt the practice of apologizing for offensive expressions inadvertently used in the hurry of daily journalism. Recently, the Oregon Statesman having indulged in the mild insinuation that the editor of a paper of hostile politics, published at Eugene City, (which paper he playfully, or metaphorically designates as the Pig Skin) was "a contraband," and having reflected in a sober moment upon the injustice of the allegation, thus apologized;

"Some time since we intimated the belief that the editor of the Eugene Pig Skin was a 'nigger.' Having perused a recent issue of his paper, we are now fully satisfied that he is only an 'injun.' Lie, Lo, and keep dark—the darker the better—for while a negro might merit some attention, an Indian cannot possibly. Go after your 'canvas,' and don't bother us—we're talking 'nigger' now."

We have hopes of Oregon yet.

Johnson Clubs.

If political clubs were included in the market quotations, Johnson Clubs would probably be cited as a good way below par. Some months since Johnson Clubs were decidedly lively; now they are slack—very slack. Says the Dramatic Chronicle:

"Not long ago it was stated in the daily papers that General Miller, our Collector, was zealously engaged in organizing Johnson Clubs, and that his subordinates in the Custom House were aiding in the good work. Thereupon the Examiner waxed wroth, and accused the Collector of trying to bedge, to "steal Democratic thunder," etc. Of late we have heard no more of those clubs. What has become of them? Has the General's zeal cooled? Has he swung round the circle and deserted Andy? Have his sentiments undergone a change since the last elections? Is he still for the President against Congress? How about his subordinates? Are they as good Johnson men as they were two months ago? But above all, we should like to know what has become of those Johnson Clubs that the General was getting up."

The Chronicle is a pert, meddlesome, and impertinently curious little organ, inordinately addicted to asking troublesome questions. Why can't it let the poor Custom House clerks alone?

The Romance of the Telegraph.

The prestige of the telegraphic news will not long survive if it continues to be as contradictory and worthless as it has been of late. The dispatches in regard to Maximilian's flight, with all the details received for several days, seem to have been manufactured out of whole cloth. The "Fenian news" of Thursday night is, probably, an immense Roorbach. Besides the fabrications, there are the most absurd blunders, which occur in good faith. Recently the operator here telegraphed that an extensive sale of "Hawaiian sugars" had taken place, and when the dispatch appeared in print, in New York, it read "Havanua cigars!"

Exalted Tribute.

It is not one of the lessons taught us by history that Boards of Aldermen, Supervisors, or other municipal bodies have been particularly sensible to the attractions of literature. As an ordinary thing they have a much keener and livelier appreciation of green turtle and crusty Port, than of crisp wit and oleoginous humor. The Supervisors of Oakland, however, are an exception. The evening fixed for "Mark Twain's" recent lecture at the Cow County metropolis happened to be also the evening for the regular session of the Board. That body, however, met, and immediately adjourned for the purpose of attending the lecture. This is, it seems to us, the most striking tribute that has yet been paid to "Mark's" genius.

A Definition.

A correspondent signing himself "Trebor," sends the following morsel for the "Lion's Mouth:"

A gentleman, who in his own estimation, bore proportions of "huge preponderosity and immense magnitude," and held the position of professor in a certain college, separated from San Francisco by a body of water somewhat less vast than the Atlantic Ocean, was called upon at a social gathering, by a lady, to define the word "periphrasis." Assuming a dignified air, he replied, "with pleasure, Madam: It is a circumrotary cycle of oratorical sonorosity circumscribing an atom of ideality lost in a verbal profundity." "Yes, sir," said she, "think you," and she became profoundly meditative. The Professor, like Sam Weller at the Pickwick and Bardolph trial, was relieved from further questioning.

A Piteous Appeal.

It seems they are having bitter weather up in Calaveras County. Furthermore, wood is dear, coal is unknown, and the people who take newspapers are very backward in coming forward to pay up (or down) their subscriptions. Under these melancholy circumstances the Calaveras Chronicle makes plaint thus:

"We are shivering with cold. Would that some of our delinquent subscribers would bring us some wood. They certainly would if they only knew that we are entirely out of wood; wouldn't they? No questions asked, and the wood shall not be re-measured."

The heart that could resist such an appeal must be harder than the nether millstone.

Sharp.

The Quincy Union says:

"We are pleased to see that the circulation of the S. F. Examiner in this county is rapidly increasing."

Whereupon the Marysville Appeal remarks:

"We fear the Union would puff the cholera if it should break out in Plumas—provided it was thought a Conservative or Copperhead disease."

These country papers are getting altogether too bright for the provinces. They will have to come down to labor in a Metropolitan field, in San Francisco—or Oakland.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

AGENTS WANTED TO CANVASS FOR THE only official Southern History of the War. THE LOST CAUSE, by E. A. Pollard, the popular Historian of the South, and editor of the Richmond Examiner during the war. Complete in one large royal octavo volume, with giving a full and authentic account of the rise and fall of the late Southern Confederacy. Written under the encouragement of Generals R. E. Lee. Johnston, Beauregard and others. The work is being liberally patronized by leading men of all classes, eager to hear and thus arrive at the truth of history, which it is impossible to do from the many histories written only from a Northern stand-point.

24 FINE STEEL PORTRAITS,

"THE OTHER SIDE,"

Agents and the public are cautioned against any other work purporting to be this one. To energetic men and women a rare chance is offered to make money. Don't fail to send for circulars of this great and important work. Adddress

LAMENT FOR SUMMER.

LIKE an argosy deep laden
With the wealth of Indian sands,
Sailing down a summer ocean
To the far-off Northern lands—

Like a golden-visioned story—
Like the heetic's bright decay,
Dying in the painted glory
Of the autumn sere and hoary,
Fade the summer days away.

VEGETABLE INSTINCTS.

A TREE which is fond of water, when planted near some brook, will set off all its principal roots in that direction. How does it know the water to be there? And how does it know that it will be able to reach the border of it! To say, in popular phrase, that the water attracts the roots in that direction, is to invent a new and very remarkable sort of attraction, that pulls at roots in the ground, and turns them out at the point of starting—is a something created to account for the fact in question, which is even more difficult than the fact itself. A friend for example, had an acqueduct of logs, which, in reaching his house, passed by a tree especially fond of water, at a considerable distance from it. Abreast of the tree there was an auger-hole in the log, that had been filled with plug of soft wood. Exactly thitherward the tree sent off a long stretch of roots, which forced their way through the plug, choking up the passage, and were found there drinking like so many thirsty animals. Was it, then, the soft wood plug that attracted these roots? It certainly should be, on the attraction principle; for the water was just as near at other points as here.

It is said that a strawberry planted in sand, with good earth a little way off, will turn its runners in the latter direction, and if the good earth is too far off to be reached, the plant will make no effort, on that side more than on the other—which is equivalent to saying that the plant has, in its life-principle, an instinct of measurement. It does not measure the ground and then itself, and then compare the two; but it has an adaptive power by which, without comparison, it graduates its actions by its possibilities.

TAXATION.—A grumbler explains the present system of raising revenue as follows:—

"Now you see, in the first place, they get the amount of a feller's business. That is taxed. Then they find out how much he earns every month, and that's taxed. Then they find out all about his profits, and on that they lay their tax. Then they manage to get some tax on what he owes. Next comes what they call the income, and that's taxed. Then, if anything is left, the preacher calls around, and gets it to sustain the church and convert the heathen."

WHEN kindly feelings are reflected—when the heart warms and expands towards others, going out to them with feelings of kindness and sympathy, the same emotions are elicited, quickened into life, and reflected back on ourselves.

SO NICE.—One of the very latest styles of ladies' hats now worn is called the "butter-dish." They are a cross between a turtle-shell and a wash-pan. "They are so nice."

HOW TO TREAT PEOPLE.—If you are looking at a picture, you try to give it the advantage of a good light. Be as courteous to your fellow-beings as you are to a picture.

TOO TRUE.—He who pokes his nose everywhere will sometimes poke it between a thumb and fore finger.

WHY should young ladies make good rifle volunteers? Because they are accustomed to bare arms.

THE PYRAMIDS OF EGYPT.

THE Pyramids of Egypt are justly reckoned among the "wonders of the world." When, why, and by whom they were erected are among the secret things that have puzzled antiquaries for above 2,000 years, and are likely to be unravelled now. They are built upon a platform of rock, which rises above the level of the adjacent plain. The largest of them is 480 feet in height, and its base covers eleven acres of ground. The second in magnitude is 456 feet high, and the third 218 feet. These are all near the small town of Ghizeh, southwest of Cairo, and many smaller ones are in the same neighborhood.

Many descriptions of them have been given by enterprising travelers. The one we have selected is taken from the travels of Dr. E. D. Clarke:

"With what amazement did we survey the vast surface that was presented to us when we arrived at this artificial mountain, which seemed to reach the clouds! Already some of our party had begun the ascent, and were pausing at the tremendous depth when they saw below.

"One of our military companions, after having surmounted the most difficult part of the undertaking, became giddy in consequence of looking down from the elevation he had attained, and being compelled to abandon the project, he hired an Arab to assist him in effecting his descent. The rest of us, more accustomed to the business of climbing heights, with many a halt for respiration, and many an exclamation of wonder, pursued our way toward the summit.

"The mode of ascent has been frequently described, and yet from the questions that are often proposed to travelers, it does not appear to be generally understood.

"The reader may imagine himself to be upon a staircase, every step of which, to a man of middle stature, is nearly breast high, and the breadth of each step is equal to its height; consequently the footing is secure, and although a retrospect in going up be sometimes fearful to persons unaccustomed to look down from any considerable elevation, yet there is little danger of falling. In some places, indeed, where the stones are decayed, caution may be required, and an Arab guide is always necessary to avoid a total interruption; but, upon the whole, the means of ascent are such that almost every one may accomplish it.

"Our progress was impeded by other causes. We carried with us a few instruments, such as our boat-compass, thermometer, a telescope, etc., these could not be trusted in the hands of the Arabs, and they were liable to be broken every instant.

"At length we reached the topmost tier, to the great delight and satisfaction of all the party. Here we found a platform thirty-two feet square, consisting of nine large stones, each of which might weigh about a tun, although they were much inferior in size to some of the stones used in the construction of this pyramid. Travelers of all ages have here inscribed their names; some are written in Greek, many in French, a few in Arabic, one or two in English, and others in Latin. We were as desirous as our predecessors to leave a memoral of our arrival. It seemed to be a tribute of thankfulness due for the success of our undertaking, and presently every one of our party were seen busy in adding the inscription of his name."

A LUCID EXPLANATION.—Said Angelina to her Edwin, as they looked through an old gleebook, "Edwin, dearest, pray what is the meaning of the line—

'Unnumbered surges grace the foaming coast?'

Serge, you know, is woollen stuff, like my bathing dress, you know. But one don't spell it with a 'u,' you know."

Said Edwin, "'M sure I don't know. P'raps it's a misprint. Fellow very likely wrote it down at Ramsgate, Tried to count the bathers there, and found he couldn't do it."—Punch.

THE Egyptians must have been good sons, because they paid such respect to their mummies.

A SHARP TRICK.—Recently a number of colliers near Chesterfield, whose stock of the "indispensable" was exhausted, and who were, as the saying is "on the spree," resorted to the following ingenious expedient to replenish their bottle. The leader of the gang first putting into the bottle, which contains a gallon, half a gallon of water, went to the Horns public house, near Chesterfiild, and called for half a gallon of gin, stating that they had already half a gallon in the bottle. The unsuspecting landlord immediately measured out the desired quantum, but the men showing no inclination to pay, he desired his gin to be returned—a request they complied with most willingly, coolly walking off to enjoy the half gallon of "gin and water" they had so cleverly obtained.

A PERSEVERING HUNTER.—A series of recent French prints represent the adventures and mischances of Parisian sportsmen, one of whom, after exhausting his ammunition to no purpose, takes his dog into his lap, and kills the fleas which infest the animal. "It won't do to go home without killing something," is his consolatory remark, as he cracks the fleas with his fingers. In another caricature a peasant approaches the hunter, and tells him a large hare inhabits a neighboring copse, to which he points with his finger. "I know it,' says the hunter; "I've been shooting at him for the last four hours."

AN UNHEALTHY HOUSE.—A dark house is always an unhealthy house, always an ill-aired house, always a dirty house. Want of light stops growth, and promotes scrofula, rickets, etc., among children. People lose their health in an unhealthy house, and if they get ill they cannot get well again in it. Three, out of many negligences and ignorances in managing the health of houses generally, I will here mention as specimens: First, that the female head in charge of any building does not think it necessary to visit every hole and corner of it every day. Second, that it is not considered essential to air, to sun, and to clean rooms when uninhabited. Third, one window is considered enough to air a room.

A FAST STORY.

AN ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman, "they have to commence ringing about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound—the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-grown head of hair and teeth in their mouths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', also, Mechanical Toys, that run by themselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"Indeed! is that so? Who is the firm that have the Dolls saying 'Mamma'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasing? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

MORN.

PEEPING through her purple bars,
Down an endless street of stars,
Melting all the ingots up,
As her eyes more brightly shine,
Morning, in a crystal cup,
Floats the bubble earth in wine.

From the red lips of the sea,
Out into immensity,
Steals a tongue of green and gold;
Soon to swarm with giddy flies,
When the mighty landscape's rolled
Further to the western skies

Splendor now by splendor quaffed,
Deeper grows at every draught,
Till the monogram of fire—
The round, red halo of the sun—
Fills with flame the heavens entire,
And sweeps all glories into one.

JOSH BILLINGS ON MOSQUITOES.—Mr. Billings thus expresses himself on the mosquitoes. "We are told that thare wa'nt anything made in vain; this is sum so, but I have thought the time spent in manufaktring musketoze wa'nt. How they were put together I never could tell; and there is one commershall peculiarity about the musketer trade, and yet the producshun is not diminished. I kan't understand this, nohow. They are born of poor but industrious parents, and are brought up with great care, under the auspices of some of our best families. They also have consummate courage. I have known a single musketeer to fite a man and his wife awl nite loug, and draw the first blood. It is very easy to kill musketoze, when you can; but in striking them you are very apt tu hit the exact place where they recently was. They are cheerful little cusses, singing as they toil."

PUNCH slanderously says: "The sun is called masculine, from its supporting and sustaining the moon, and finding her the wherewithal to shine always as she does of a night, and from his being obliged to keep such a family of stars. The moon is called feminine, because she is constantly changing, just like a ship blown about by every wind. The church is feminine, because she is married to the State; and Time is masculine, because he trifles with the ladies."

TOY NOVELTIES.—Several new scientific toys, in Paris, have taken the place of Pharoah's serpents. One is a "rainbow-bubble"—a bubble inside a common soap-bubble. "Japanese fireworks" and "crocodile tears," or "carmes de diable" (devil's tears) are also in the list. The latter blaze when thrown into water.

NATURALISTS have remarked that the squirrel is continually chattiug to his fellow-squirrels in the woods. This, we have every reason to suppose, arises from that animal's love of gossip, as he is notoriously one of the greatest tail bearers among his tribe.

A HEROINE.

WHY, they are maidens of heroic toueh,
And yet they seem like things of gossamer
You pinch the life out of, as out of motbs.
O! it is not loud tones and mouthingness,
'Tis not the arms akimbo and large strides,
That makes a woioan's force. The tiniest birds,
With softest downy breasts, have passions in them,
And are brave with love.

THE BEST THINGS.—The best thing to give your enemy is forgiveness; to your opponent, tolerance; to a friend your heart; to your child, a good example; to your father, deference; to your mother, conduct that will make her proud of you; to yourself, respect; to all men, charity.

SOMEBODY says a baby laughing in its dreams is conversing with angels. Perhaps so—but we have seen them crying in their walking hours as though they were having a spat with the devil.

THE useful encourages itself, for the multitude produce it, and no one can dispense with it; the beautiful must be encouraged, for few can set it forth, and many need it.

WHAT is the difference between an auctiou and sea-sickness? One is the sale of effects, the other the effects of a sail.

AYER'S
CHERRY PECTORAL,

FOR THE RAPID CURE OF

COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA, HOARSENESS, CROUP, BRONCHITIS, INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION, AND FOR THE RELIEF OF CONSUMPTIVE PATIENTS IN ADVANCED STAGES OF THE DISEASE.

SO wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous are the cases of its cures, that almost every section of country abounds in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other Expectorant is too apparent to escape observation and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs that are incident to our climate. While many inferior remedies thrust upon the community have failed and been discarded, this having gained friends by every trial, conferred benefits on the afflicted they can never forget, and produced cures too numerous and too remarkable to be forgotten.

We can only assure the public, that its quality is carefully kept up to the best it ever has been, and that it may be relied on to do for their relief all that it has ever done.

Great numbers of clergymen, Physicians, Statesmen, and eminent personages, have lent their names to certify the unparalleled usefulness of our remedies, but space here will not permit the insertion of them. The Agents below named furnish gratis our AMERICAN ALMANAC in which they are given; with also full descriptions of the complaints they cure.

Those who require an alterative medicine to purify the blood will find AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA the remedy to use. Try it once, and you will know its value.

Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by CRANE & BRIGHAM, San Francisco, and all Dealers.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure, but

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND
IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.
2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.
3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.
4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.
5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.
6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.
7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.
9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.
10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

LOCAL ART ITEMS.

THE name of Thomas Nast is one well known to all readers of the New York illustrated papers published during the last five or six years; and among them he has acquired the reputation of being the best of the many delineators of the stirring and effective scenes of the camp, the march and the battle. It had never before been our pleasure to view a painting from the brush of this young artist, and although an admirer of his spirited drawings—poorly engraved and hastily printed as many of them were—we were rather unprepared for the pleasure we had in viewing his late work of "Sherman's march through Georgia," now on exhibition at Snow and Roos' Gallery.

The painting, although not one destined to take a very high rank as a work of art, is possessed of much merit. For a display of the artist's peculiar powers the subject could not have been more happily chosen. It represents an incident merely of the triumphal march to the sea: the halting of a portion of the army on the plantation of some Southern lord, who is evidently at the wars, while the haughty dames of his family are left alone to do the honors of the house. The disdain and contempt shown in their reception of our brave "boys in blue;" the dignified manliness exhibited by the officers in communication with them; the reckless independence and utter disregard of the open but ineffective treason manifested by the privates; the grateful devotion, amusing obsequiousness and eager curiosity displayed by the emancipated slaves; and the prevailing enthusiasm and excitement of a patriotic soldiery, are faithfully and effectively rendered.

The chief merit of the picture lies, however, in the admirable grouping. Indeed, the painting is made up of many striking groups, either of which is complete in itself. Several of the figures, particularly those in the foreground, are drawn with spirit and fidelity. The accessories are tolerably well managed, and the general effect is pleasing. An element of comicality, not too sparingly introduced, pervades the whole, keeping out with interest what the picture lacks in imagination. Altogether, the work is one of which the artist may feel proud, and in which the public will find much profit and satisfaction. As the initiatory movement toward the display in this city of paintings that have received just praise in the East, and as tending to the gratification of the desire of the community, we earnestly hope for the success of the exhibition.

In connection with this picture are to be seen, with the advantage of an improved light, many excellent works that have long lain neglected in the darkness of the inner gallery.

ASTRÆA.

A "GREAT" PICTURE.—Bierstadt is said to be engaged upon a picture of such dimensions that he is obliged to use a ladder and scaffolding while working on it, like a man painting the side of a house. The subject is Yo-Semite, being a view up the valley looking through a stupendous gorge toward pale blue mountains in the far distance. The perspective is spoken of as something quite wonderful, and the picture, as conveying "an idea of grandeur and sublimity which has rarely been attained in color." A New York paper further says in regard to what Bierstadt is doing: "He also has a striking little picture in his studio of the Hudson River, as seen from the windows of his house, with no traces of cultivation to mar the beauty of the scene as the artist imagines it to have appeared a century ago. His new house is a curious affair, built of blue stone and surmounted by a wooden cupola. The whole north side appears to be intended for the studio, which is a grand hall, thirty feet high."

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, an only son and spendthrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and forty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amherst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post-mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London. In London, at the house of Stewart Routh, a gentlemanly gambler and adventurer of good accomplishments and address, the reader is introduced to his wife Harriet, commonly addressed by Routh as "Harry,"—a woman of rare mental qualifications and quick appreciation, thoroughly devoted to her husband, his counselor in all his schemes, and a most efficient aid in his precarious mode of living.

One Deane, an American, a cool, sharp, "posted" man, with abundant means, is also introduced, whose cleverness is even too much for the designs of Routh and his wife. George Dallas receives a letter from his mother, who writes him that the one hundred and forty pounds, obtained by a great risk and almost criminal sacrifice, will be given to him by her in person at Amherst. He informs Routh of the import of his mother's letter. Routh, meanwhile, is organizing a company for working some newly discovered silver mines in Brazil, which promises to be "a big thing," but is badly in want of funds to successfully launch his scheme; when he learns from Deane that he is to receive for some stock transaction three thousand pounds, which sum Deane proposes to keep in his desk for a few days until wanted; and, in celebration of the event, he invites Routh and Dallas to dine with him at a fashionable restaurant on the same evening. Routh tells his wife that he must have Deane's money "one way or another." The dinner comes off, but Routh is not present.

George Dallas again visits Amherst under his author-name of "Paul Ward," to receive from his mother the money she promised him; when he learns from her lips that she has secretly sent her diamonds to Paris to be imitated, with the object of pledging the genuine ones as the only available means of obtaining the amount. The jewelry failing to arrive, his mother requests him to stop at Amherst for a few days to await its arrival. While sketching a private park, "The Sycamores," a chance acquaintance is brought about—which rapidly ripens into mutual though unavowed feelings of affection between Miss Clare Carruthers, a beautiful young lady of nineteen, the favorite niece and heir of the rich Capel Carruthers—Dallas' father-in-law—and our hero; known only to Miss Carruthers as "Paul Ward," the author. After receiving the bracelet from his mother, George Dallas returns to London, arriving late in the evening. He immediately goes to visit Routh at his residence, and not finding him in shows Harriet the bracelet, proposing to dispose of it the next morning, and pay his indebtedness to Routh.

"I DID not expect to have to stay at Amherst, so I took no clothes with me," he explained, "and had to buy a shirt and a pair of stockings for Sunday, so as not to scandalise the natives. Rather an odd place to replenish one's wardrobe, by-the-by."

Harriet looked sharply at the coat, and, passing the chair on which it lay on her way to her own, felt its texture with a furtive touch. Then she sat down, gave Dallas wine, and once more fell to examining the bracelet. It might have occurred to any other man in George's position that it was rather an odd proceeding on the part of Mrs. Routh to keep him there at so late an hour with no apparent purpose, and without any expressed expectation of Routh's return; but George seldom troubled himself with reflections upon anybody's conduct, and invariably followed Harriet's lead without thinking about it at all. Recent events had shaken Routh's influence, and changed the young man's views and tastes; but Harriet still occupied her former place in his regard and in his habit of life, which in such cases as his signifies much. With a confidential air she now talked to him, her busy fingers twisting the bracelet as she spoke, her pale face turned to him, but her eyes somewhat averted. She told him that Routh had been surprised and annoyed at his (Dallas) being so long away from town, and had written to him to tell him that he had been so pressed for money, so worried by duns, and so hampered by the slow proceedings of the company connected with the new speculation, that he had been obliged to go away, and must keep away, until Dallas could let him have one hundred and forty pounds. George was concerned to hear all this, and found it hard to reconcile with the good spirits in which Routh had been when he had seen him last; but he really knew so little of the man's affairs beyond having a general notion that they were hopelessly complicated, and subject to volcanic action of an utterly disconcerting nature, that he regarded his own surprise as unreasonable, and forbore to express it.

"It is of the utmost importance to Stewart to have the money at once," Harriet continued. "You see that yourself; he told you all in his letter."

"Very extraordinary it should have been lost! Directed to P. O., Amherst, of course? I wish I had got it, Mrs. Routh; I'd have gone at once and sold the bracelet before I came to you at all, and brought the money. But I can do it early in the morning, can't I? I can take it to some good jeweller and get cash for it, and be here by twelve o'clock, so as not to keep Routh a moment longer than I need in suspense. Will a hundred and forty square him for the present, Mrs. Routh? I'm sure to get more for the bracelet—don't you think so?—and of course he can have it all, if he wants it."

The young man spoke in an eager tone, and the woman listened with a swelling heart. Her full red lip trembled for a passing instant—consideration for—kindness for the only human creature she loved touched Harriet as nothing besides had power to touch her.

"I am sure the bracelet is worth more than that sum," she said; "it is worth more than two hundred pounds, I dare say. But you forget, Mr. Dallas, that you must not be too precipitate in this matter. It is of immense importance to Stewart to have this money, but there are precautions to be taken."

"Precautions, Mrs. Routh! what precautions? The bracelet's my own, isn't it, and principally valuable because there's no bother about selling a thing of the kind?"

She looked at him keenly; she was calculating to what extent she might manage him, how far he would implicitly believe her statements, and rely upon her judgment. His countenance was eminently re-assuring, so she went on:

"Certainly the bracelet is your own, and it could be easily sold, were you only to consider yourself, but you have your mother to consider."

"My mother! How? when she parted with the bracelet on purpose."

"True," said Harriet; "but perhaps you are not aware that diamonds, of anything like the value of these, are as well known, their owners, buyers, and whereabouts, as blood horses, their pedigrees, and purchasers. I think it would be unsafe for you to sell this bracelet in London; you may be sure that the diamonds would be known by any jeweller on whose respectability you could sufficiently rely to sell the jewels to him. It would be very unpleasant, and of course very dangerous to your mother, if the diamonds were known to be those purchased by Mr. Carruthers, and a cautious jeweller thought proper to ask him any questions."

George looked grave and troubled as Harriet put these objections to his doing as he had proposed, for the immediate relief of Routh, clearly before him. He never for a moment doubted the accuracy of her information and the soundness of her fears.

"I understand," he said; "but what can I do? I must sell the bracelet to get the money, and sooner or later will make no difference in the risk you speak of; but it may make all the difference to Routh. I can't, I won't delay in this matter; don't ask me, Mrs. Routh. It is very generous of you to think of my risk, but——"

"It is not you risk," she interrupted him by saying—"it is your mother's. If it were your own I might let you take it, for Stewart's sake"—an indefinable compassion was in the woman's face, an unwonted softness in her blue eyes—"but your mother has done and suffered much for you, and she must be protected even if Stewart has to lie hidden a day or two longer. You must not do anything rash. I think I know what would be the best thing for you to do."

"Tell me, Mrs. Routh," said George, who highly appreciated the delicate consideration for his mother which inspired Harriet's misgivings. "Tell me, and whatever it is I will do it."

"It is this," said Harriet: "I know there is a large trade in diamonds at Amsterdam, and that the merchants there, chiefly Jews, deal in the loose stones, and are not, in our sense, jewelers. You could dispose of the diamonds there without suspicion or difficulty; it is the common resort of people who have diamonds to sell—London is not. If you would go there at once you might sell the diamonds and send the money to Stewart, or rather to me, to an address we would decide upon, without more than the delay of a couple of days. Is there anything to keep you in town?"

"No," said George, "nothing. I could start this minute, as far as any business I've got to do is concerned."

Harriet drew a long breath, and her color rose.

"I wish you would, Mr. Dallas," she said, earnestly. "I hardly like to urge you, it seems so selfish; and Stewart, if he were here, would make so much lighter of the difficulty he is in than I can bring myself to do, but you don't know how grateful I should be if you would."

The pleading earnestness of her tone, the eager entreaty in her eyes, impressed George painfully; he hastened to assure her that he would accede to any request of hers.

"I am so wretched when he is away from me, Mr. Dallas," said Harriet; "I am so lonely and full of dread. Anything not involving you or your mother in risk, which would shorten the time of his absence, would be an unspeakable boon to me."

"Then of course I will go at one, Mrs Routh," said George. "I will go to-morrow. I am sure you are quite right, and Amsterdam's the place to do the trick at. I wish I could have seen Routh first, for a moment; but as I can't, I can't. Let me see. Amsterdam. There's a boat for Rotterdam by the river, and—oh, by Jove! here's a Bradshaw—let's see when the next goes."

He walked to the little sideboard, and selected the above-named compendium of useful knowledge from a mass of periodicals, circulars, bills, and prospectuses of companies immediately to be brought out, and offering unheard-of advantages to the inventors.

The moment his eyes were turned away from her a fierce impatience betrayed itself in Harriet's face, and as he sat slowly turning over the sibylline leaves, and consulting the incomprehensible and maddening index, she pressed her clasped hands against her knees, as though it were almost impossible to resist the impulse which prompted her to tear the book from his dilatory fingers.

"Here it is," said George at length, "and uncommonly cheap, too. The Argus for Rotterdam, seven A. M. That's rather early, though, isn't it? To-morrow morning, too, or rather this morning, for it's close upon one now. Let's see when the Argus, or some other boat, goes next. H'm; not till Thursday at the same hour. That's rather far off."

Harriet was breathing quickly, and her face was quite white, but she sat still and controlled her agony of anxiety. "I have urged him as strongly as I dare," she thought; "fate must do the rest."

Fate did the rest.

"After all, I may as well go at seven in the morning, Mrs. Routh. All my things are packed up already, and it will give me a good start. I might get my business done before Wednesday night, almost, if I'm quick about it; at all events, early the following day."

"You might, indeed," said Harriet, in a faint voice.

"There's one little drawback, though, to that scheme," said Dallas. "I haven't the money. They owe me a trifle at the Mercury, and I shall have to wait till to-morrow and get it, and go by Ostend, the swell route. I can't go without it, that's clear."

Harriet looked at him with a wan blank face, in which there was something of weariness, and under it something of menace, but her tone was quite amiable and obliging as she said:

"I think it is a pity to incur both delay and expense by waiting. I have always a little ready money by me, in case of our having to make a move suddenly, or of an illness, or one of the many contingencies which men never think of, and women never forget. You can have it with pleasure. You can return it to me," she said, with a forced smile, "when you send Routh the hundred and forty."

"Thank you," said Dallas. "I shan't mind taking it from you for a day or two, as it is to send help to Routh the sooner. Then I'll go, that's settled, and I had better leave you, for you were tired when I came in, and you must be still more tired now. I shall get back from Amsterdam as quickly as I can, tell Routh, but I see my way to making a few pounds out of the place. They want padding at the Mercury, and I shan't come back by return of post." He had risen now, and had extended his hand towards the bracelet, which lay in its open case on the table.

A sudden thought struck Harriet.

"Stop," she said; "I don't think it would do to offer this bracelet in its present shape, anywhere. The form and the setting are too remarkable. It would probably be re-sold entire, and it is impossible to say what harm might come of its being recognized. It must be taken to pieces, and you must offer the diamonds separately for sale. It will make no appreciable difference in the money you will receive, for such work as this is like book-binding—dear to buy, but never counted in the price when you want to sell."

"What am I to do, then?" asked George, in a dismayed tone. "I could not take out the diamonds, you know: they are firmly set—see here." He turned the gold band inside out, and showed her the plain flat surface at the back of the diamonds and turquoises.

"Wait a moment," said Harriet. "I think I can assist you in this respect. Do you study the bracelet a bit until I come to you."

She left the room, and remained away for a little time. Dallas stood close by the table, having lowered the gas-burners, and by their light he closely inspected the rivets, the fastenings, and the general form of the splendid ornament he was so anxious to get rid of, idly thinking how well it must have looked on his mother's still beautiful arm, and wondering whether she was likely soon to be obliged to wear the counterfeit. His back was turned to the door by which Harriet had left the room, so that, when she came softly to the aperture again, he did not perceive her. She carefully noted his attitude, and glided softly in, carrying several small implements in her right hand, and in her left held cautiously behind her back a coat, which she dexterously dropped upon the floor quite unperceived by Dallas, behind the chair on which he had thrown his. She then went up to the table, and showed him a small pair of nippers, a pair of scissors of peculiar form, and a little implement, with which she told him workers in jewelry loosened stones in their setting, and punched them out. Dallas looked with some surprise at the collection, regarding them as unusual items of a lady's paraphernalia, and said, gaily:

"You are truly a woman of resources, Mrs. Routh. Who would ever have thought of your having all those things ready at a moment's notice?"

Harriet made no reply, but she could not quite conceal the disconcerting effect of his words.

"If I have made a blunder in this," she thought, "it is a serious one, but I have more to do, and must not think yet."

She sat down, cleared a space on the table, placed the bracelet and the little tools before her, and set to work at once at her task of demolition. It was a long one, and the sight was pitiful as she placed jewel after jewel carefully in a small box before her, and proceeded to loosen one after another. Sometimes George took the bracelet from her and aided her, but the greater part of the work was done by her. The face bent over the disfigured gold and maltreated gems was a remarkable one in its mingled expression of intentness and absence; her will was animating her fingers in their task, but her mind, her fancy, her memory, were away, and, to judge by the rigidity of the cheeks and lips, the unrelaxed tension of the low white brow, on no pleasing excursion. The pair worked on in silence, only broken occasionally by a word from George, expressive of admiration for her dexterity and the celerity with which she detached the jewels from the gold setting. At length all was done—the golden band, limp and scratched, was a mere commonplace piece of goldsmith's work—the diamonds lay in their box in a shining heap, the discarded turquoises on the table; all was done.

"What shall we do with these things?" asked George. "They are not worth selling—at least not now—but I think the blue things might make up pretty with the gold again. Will you keep them, Mrs. Routh? and some day, when I am better off, I'll have them set for you, in remembrance of this night in particular, and of all your goodness to me in general."

He was looking at the broken gold and the turquoises, thinking how trumpery they looked now—not at her. Fortunately not at her, for if he had seen her face he must have known—even he, unsuspicious as he was—that she was shaken by some inexplicably powerful feeling. The dark blood rushed into her face, dispersed itself over her fair throat in blotches, and made a sudden dreadful tingling in her ears For a minute she did not reply, and then Dallas did look at her, but the agony had passed over her.

"No—no," she said; "the gold is valuable, and the turquoises as much so as they can be for their size. You must keep them for a rainy day."

"I'm likely to see many," said George, with half a smile and half a sigh, "but I don't think I'll ever use these things to keep me from the pelting of the pitiless shower. If you won't keep them for yourself, Mrs. Routh, perhaps you'll keep them for me until I return."

"Oh yes," said Harriet, "I will keep them. I will lock them up in my desk; you will know where to find them."

She drew the desk towards her as she spoke, took out of it a piece of paper, without seeing that one side had some writing upon it, swept the scattered turquoises into the sheet, then folded a gold band in a second, placed both in a large blue envelope, with the device of Routh's last new company scheme upon it, and sealed the parcel over the wafer.

"Write your name on it," she said to George, who took up a pen and obeyed her. She opened a drawer at the side of the desk, and put away the little parcel quite at the back. Then she took from the same drawer seven sovereigns, which George said would be as much as he would require for the present, and which he carefully stowed away in his pocket-book. Then he sat down at the desk, and playfully wrote an I O U for the amount.

"That's business-like," said George, smiling, but the smile by which she replied was so wan and weary, that George again commented on her fatigue, and began to take leave of her.

"I'm off, then" he said, "and you won't forget to tell Routh how much I wanted to see him. Among other things to tell him—However, I suppose he has seen Deane since I have been away?"

Harriet was occupied in turning down the gasburner by which she had just lighted the candle again. She now said:

"How stupid I am! as if I couldn't have lighted you to the door first, and put the gas out afterwards! The truth is, I am so tired; I'm quite stupefied. What did you say, Mr. Dallas? There, I've knocked your coat off the chair; here it is, however. You asked me something, I think?"

George took the coat she held from her, hung it over his arm, felt for his hat (the room being lighted only by the feeble candle) and repeated his words:

"Routh has seen Deane, of course, since I've been away?"

"No," Harriet replied, with distinctness, "he has not—he has not."

"Indeed," said George. "I am surprised at that. But Deane was huffed, I remember, on Thursday, when Routh broke his engagement to dine with him, and said it must depend on whether he was in the humor to meet him the next day, as Routh asked him to do. So I suppose he wasn't in the humor, eh? And now he'll be huffed with me, but I can't help it."

"Why?" asked Harriet; and she spoke the single word with a strange effort, and a painful dryness of the throat.

"Because I promised to give him his revenge at billiards. I won ten pounds from him that night, and uncommonly lucky it was for me; it enabled me to get away from my horrible old shrew of a landlady, and, indeed, indirectly it enables me to start in this business to-morrow."

"How?" said Harriet. Again she spoke but one word, and again with difficulty and a dryness in the throat. She set down the candle, and leaned against the table, while George stood between her and the door, his coat over his arm.

"You didn't notice that I told you I was all packed up and ready to go. It happened luckily, didn't it?" And then George told his listener how he had paid his landlady, and removed his modest belongings on the previous Friday morning to a coffee-house, close to the river, too. "By Jove! I'm in luck's way, it seems," he said; "so I shall merely go and sleep there, and take my traps on board the Argus. I have only such clothes as I shall want, no matter where I am," he said. "They'll keep the trunk with my books until I come back, and Deane must wait for his revenge with the balls and cues for the same auspicious occasion. Let's hope he'll be in a better temper, and have forgiven Routh. He was awfully riled at his note on thursday evening."

"Did—did you see it?" asked Harriet; and, as she spoke, she leaned still more heavily against the the table.

"No," replied Dallas, "I did not; but Deane told me Routh asked him to meet him the next day. He didn't, it seems."

"No," said Harriet; "and Stewart is very much annoyed about it. Mr. Deane owed him money, and he asked him for some in that note."

"Indeed," said George; "he could have paid him, then. I happen to know. He had a lot of gold and notes with him. The tenner he lost to me he paid in a note, and he changed a fiver to pay for our dinner, and he was bragging and bouncing the whole time about the money he had about him, and what he would, and what he would not, do with it. So it was sheer spite made him neglect to pay Routh, and I hope he'll dun him again. The idea of Routh being in the hole he's in, and a fellow like that owing him money. How much is it, Mrs. Routh?"

"I—I don't know," said Harriet.

"There, I'm keeping you talking still. I am the most thoughtless fellow." It never occurred to George that she had kept him until she had learned what she wanted to know. "Good-by, Mrs. Routh, good-by."

She had passed him, the candle in her hand, and this farewell was uttered in the hall. He held out his hand; she hesi tated for a moment, and then gave him hers. He pressed it fervently; it was deadly cold.

"Don't stay in the chill air," he said; "you are shivering now."

Then he went away with a light cheerful step.

Harriet Routh stood quite still, as he had left her, for one full minute; then she hurried into the sitting-room, shut the door, dropped on her knees before a chair, and ground her face fiercely against her arms. There she knelt, not sobbing, not weeping, but shuddering—shuddering with the quick terrible iteration of mortal agony of spirit, acting on an exhausted frame. After a while she rose, and then her face was dreadful to look upon, in its white fixed despair.

"If I have saved him," she said, as she sat wearily down by the table again, and once more leaned her face upon her hands—"if I have saved him! It may be there is a chance; at all events, there is a chance. How wonderful, how inconceivably wonderful that he should not have heard of it! The very stones of the street seem to cry it out, and he knows nothing. If anything should prevent his going? But no; nothing will, nothing can. This was the awful danger—this was the certain, the inevitable risk; if I have averted it, if I have saved him, for the time!"

The chill of coming dawn struck cold to her limbs, the sickness of long watching, of fear, and of sleeplessness was at her heart, but Harriet Routh did not lie down on her bed all that dreadful night. Terrible fatigue weighed down her eyelids, and made her flesh tremble and quiver over the aching bones.

"I must not sleep—I should not wake in time," she said, as she forced herself to rise from her chair, and paced the narrow room, when the sudden numbness of sleep threatened to fall upon her. "I have something to do."

Dawn came, then sunrise, then the sounds, the stir of morning. Then Harriet bathed her face in cold water, and looked in her toilet-glass at her haggard features. The image was not reassuring; but she only smiled a bitter smile, and made a mocking gesture with her hand.

"Never any more," she murmured—"never any more."

The morning was cold and raw, but Harriet heeded it not. She glanced out of the window of her bedroom before she left it, wearing her bonnet and shawl, and closely veiled. Then she closed the shutters, locked the door, withdrew the key, and came into the sitting-room. She went to a chair and took up a coat which lay at the back of it; then she looked round for a moment as if in search of something. Her eye lighted on a small but heavy square of black marble which lay on the writing-table, and served as a paper-press. She then spread the coat on the table, placed the square of marble on it, and rolled it tightly round the heavy centre, folding and pressing the parcel into the smallest possible dimensions. This done, she tied it tightly with a strong cord, and, concealing it under her shawl, went swiftly out of the house. No one saw her issue from the grim, gloomy door—the neighboring housemaids had not commenced their matutinal task of door-step cleaning, alleviated by gossip—and she went away down the street, completely unobserved. Went away, with her head down, her face hidden, with a quick, steady step, and an unfaltering purpose. There were not many wayfarers abroad in the street, and of those she saw none, and was remarked by only one.

Harriet Routh took her way towards the river, and reached Westminster bridge as the clock in the great tour of the new palace marked half-past six. All was quiet. A few of the laggards of the working classes were straggling across the bridge to their daily toil, a few barges were moving sluggishly upon the muddy water; but there was no stir, no business yet. Harriet lingered when she had reached the centre of the bridge; a figure was just vanishing at the southern end, the northern was clear of people. She leaned over the parapet and looked down—no boat, no barge was near. Then she dropped the parcel she had carried into the river, and the water closed over it. Without the delay of an instant, she turned and retraced her steps towards home. As she neared South Molton street she found several of the shops open, and, entering one, she purchased a black marble letter press. It was not precisely similar to that with which she had weighted the parcel which now lay in the bed of the river; but the difference was trifling, and not to be perceived by the eye of a stranger.

Near the house in which the Rouths occupied apartments there was an archway which formed the entrance to some mews. As she passed this open space Harriet's glance fell upon the inquisitive countenance of a keen-looking, ragged street boy, who was lying contentedly on his back under the archway, with his arms under his head and propped upon the curbstone. A sudden impulse arrested her steps. "Have you no other place to lie than here?" she asked the boy, who jumped up with great alacrity, and stood before her in an attitude almost respectful.

"Yes, ma'am," he said, "I have, but I'm here, waiting for an early job."

She gave him a shilling and a smile—not such a smile as she once had to give, but the best that was left her—and went on to the door of the house she lived in. She opened it with a key and went in.

The boy remained where she had left him, apparently ruminating, and wagging his tousled head sagely.

"Whatever is she up to?" he asked of himself, in perplexity. "It's a rum start, as far as I knows on it, and I means to know more. But how is she in it? I shan't say nothing till I knows more about that." And then Mr. Jim Swain went away to a more likely quarter for early jobs.

Fortune favored Mrs. Routh on that morning. She gained her bedroom unseen and unheard, and, having hastily undressed, lay down to rest, if rest would come to her—at least to await in quiet the ordinary hour at which the servant was accustomed to call her. It came and passed; but Harriet did not rise.

She slept a little when all the world was up and busy—slept until the second delivery of letters brought one for her, which the servant took at once to her room.

The letter was from George Dallas, and contained merely a few lines, written when he was on the point of starting, and posted at the riverside. He apologised to Harriet for a mistake which he had made on the previous night. He had taken Routh's coat instead of his own, and had not discovered the error until he was on his way to the steamer, and it was too late to repair it. He hoped it would not matter, as he had left his own coat at South Molton street, and no doubt Routh could wear it on an occasion.

When Harriet had read this note she lay back upon her pillow and fell into a deep sleep, which was broken by Routh's coming into her room early in the afternoon. He looked pale and haggard, and he stood by the bedside in silence. But she—she sat up, and flung her arms round him with a wonderfully good imitation of her former manner, and when she told him all that had passed her husband caught her to his breast with passionate fondness and gratitude, and declared over and over again that her ready wit and wonderful fortitude had saved him.

Saved him? How, and from what?

ON THE TRAIL.

I AM a police superintendent in a large iron-making town, and for upwards of twenty years have had the care of a populous colliery district. Many a strange incident has come under my notice in the course of so long a service. One in particular I remember well, as practically illustrating a remark made in the Times on the conviction of Muller, that crimes of a conspicuous character are generally committed by the class that is least suspected. I was called one evening to quell a disturbance between several colliers and a party of Irishmen. The colliers, it appears, maddened with drink, had assailed the latter, driven them into a dwelling and would speedily have killed one or more, but for the opportune arrival of the police. The night afterwards, I received a note from the railway authorities that a coal-train had been thrown off the line by some miscreant or other, who had placed sleepers along the rails. Knowing that colliers working at a distance invariably returned by these trains, and remembering the struggle of the night before, I at once concluded this to be an attempt at Irish revenge, and pursued my investigation accordingly.

A few nights after, another coal-train was thrown off the rails, as, in the former case, however, without harm to the men; but this second attempt spurred me on, so that certain suspected persons were speedily in custody. But I soon found that these were not "my men." It is useless for me to expatiate on the unerring signs by which innocence invariably asserts itself. The Irishmen were violent in their cups, but most certainly incapable of the atrocious act of which they were accused.

Scarcely had a week passed when the whole neighborhood was thrilled by an attempt to destroy a passenger train. At, a distance of twelve miles from the town where I live there was another town, to which our tradesmen resorted in numbers every Wednesday to market. In the evening, the last train, as usual, bore its numerous passengers to their homes. It was summer-time, and merrily they dashed along the rugged bank of a mountain-river, winding in amongst the hills. But soon the picture was changed; turning a curve in full career, the engine left the rails, and cutting deeply into the embankment, rolled on its side, fortunately having continued just a sufficient time in progress to break the shock of the carriages. There was an awful cry of lamentation, a wild medley, a hurried scene; men and women seeking to clamber through the opening above the locked doors, too intent on personal safety to think of anything else. Most were bruised, and all were frightened. While messengers were dispatched to the nearest station, others searched along the route for the cause of the mishap. The scene of the accident was a curve, and a rail had been forcibly removed. The miscreant—for it was soon seen that a villain's hand had been there—had fortunately been ignorant of mechanics. He had taken up the rail by the ravine—for I have omitted to mention that there was a steep precipice at this point—and naturally thought that the train, with its load of human life, would have tumbled over. The rail next to the river was the "safe" one, and so the engine simply ploughed along towards the scarp of the mountain.

When the details of this lucky escape reached me, I felt that my reputation was at stake. This was evidently number Three of the diabolical attempts of the same hand. The first inquiry made was, who drove the train? and one or two questions of a similar character put me in possession of the fact, that the driver of the train and the driver of the coal-engine trains at the time the trucks were thrown off was one and the same person. "Now, then, for the driver," said I, and marched to his lodgings. I found him a quiet, inoffensive sort of young fellow, not a likely man to have a malignant enemy. He was unmarried, and somewhat fresh to his duties on the line, not having been in the position very long. We at once touched on the subject of the accident, but I found he was quite at sea as to the cause.

"Have you an enemy," said I, "or any one who entertains any malice against you?"

No; he thought not.

"You are unmarried, I believe?"

Yes; he was.

"Courting, perhaps?" I suggested.

He confessed to the soft impeachment.

"Have you any objection to tell me who the lady is?" inquired I, for we police officers are sometimes obliged to override delicate scruples. He mentioned the name of a young woman residing at a farm-house six miles down the valley, and within half a mile of the scene of the accident.

"O, so the damsel lives there, does she? Now, has she any other sweethearts besides yourself?"

He thought there had been one, a carpenter; but, quoth the driver, complacently smoothing an incipient beard, "She has no lover now but me."

"Where does this carpenter live?"

"About half a mile from the farm," he answered. I said nothing but kept my own counsel.

The morning after, and at the scene of the accident, I had found a large thick stake, cut evidently from the adjoining wood. This had been used to prize up the rail from the sleeper. Examining it minutely, I saw that it had been cut recently, and that with a notched knife. Here was something that might aid me on the trail.

So, with this idea uppermost, I started on the mission, and after a pleasant drive reached the little hamlet where the carpenter lived. The district was very mountainous and rugged; and as I mounted the winding road toward the house, I could hear the monotone of the river near which so narrow an escape had taken place. The door was soon opened to my knock, and by the carpenter himself, a cool, self-possessed young man, whose inquiring eyes seemed to read my errand in a moment, yet he asked me what I wanted, without the change of a muscle. I entered into his little room, and told him I had a suspicion he could enlighten me on the cause of the railroad accident.

No, he couldn't; he had heard of it, like the rest.

Would he allow me to search him?

Certainly; and forthwith various articles were in my hand. On his person I found two pocket-knives, each of which would have served to cut the stake. As I paused a moment, and held them in my hand, he heedlessly observed: "That knife" (pointing to one) "I only put into my pocket this morning, as I generally keep it at home." I opened the knife; the blade was notched; and looking up from the article to the carpenter, caught his eye. We knew one another's thought in an instant. He accompanied me tranquilly to town. At the trial, the knife figured in evidence; and various corroborating matters satisfied the jury of his guilt. It turned out that he loved the farm-girl, and was incited by jealousy toward the driver of the train to do the act which so nearly caused so frightful an accident. He was sentenced to seven years' transportation.

PURITY OF CHARACTER.—Over the beauty of the plum and apricot there grows a bloom and beauty more exquisite than the fruit itself—a soft delicate flush that overspreads its blushing cheek. Now if you strike your hand over that, and it is once gone, it is gone forever, for it never grows but once. The flower that hangs in the morning, impearled with dew—arrayed with jewels—once shake it, so that the beads roll off, and you may sprinkle water over it as you please, yet it can never be made again what it was when the dew fell slightly upon it from heaven! On a frosty morning you may see the panes of glass covered with landscapes, mountains, lakes, and trees, blended in a beautiful fantastic picture. Now lay your hand upon the glass, and by the scratch of your finger, or by the warmth of the palm, all the delicate tracery will be obliterated. So there is in youth a beauty and purity of character, which, when once touched and defiled, can never be restored; a fringe more delicate than frostwork, and which, when torn and broken, will never be re-embroidered. When a young man leaves his father's house, with the blessings of his mother's tears still wet upon his forehead, if he once loses that early purity of character, it is a loss that he can never make whole again. Such is the consequence of crime. Its effect cannot be eradicated; it can only be forgiven.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

THE SHAKSPEARE AND BACON QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD GRANT WHITE, better known perhaps as a Shakspearian scholar than any other American, seems inclined to treat Mr. Holmes and his new attempt to show that Bacon wrote the plays attributed to Shakspeare, in the most cavalier style. In alluding to the book in the "Nebulae" of the Galaxy of Nov. 15th, he undertakes to ridicule Mr. Holmes' theory as being too preposterous to call for any attempt at refutation, though acknowledging at the same time that he has not read the volume. We think that Mr. White will discover that he has not been discreet or sufficiently careful of his reputation as a Shakspearian in assuming to deal in so rash and flippant a style with a work of the calibre of the one in question, which it is a very serious mistake to place (as Mr. White seems disposed to do) in the same category with Miss Bacon's "ponderous octavo." We also can say, with Mr. White, though we should have preferred a less ambiguous and slovenly form of expression for the statement, "the present writer is probably one of the exceedingly few people in the world who have read every word of that tremendous tome;" and having also read Mr. Holmes' still more "tremendous tome;" we warn all who are interested in the subject, against falling into the error of imagining that the two books have anything in common except the subject. But some of our readers may like to hear Mr. White speak for himself:

"A New England woman, Miss Delia Bacon, was the first to broach this preposterous notion some years ago in Putnam's Magazine. It would be cruel as well as unreasonable to attribute the speedy demise of that excellent periodical and the subsequent sad fate of the lady to the depressing effect of the utter failure of the first of a series of articles which were expected to make such a stir in the literary world, and to take the greatest reputation in literature from one man and give it to another; but the events were strikingly associated. The article failed even to provoke a reply, and was not followed up by its intended successors. Miss Bacon went to England and there elaborated her whole theory, publishing it in a ponderous octavo volume which, in the words of her best if not her only apologist, Mr. Hawthorne, 'fell with a dead thump at the feet of the public, and has never been picked up.' Mr. Hawthorne wrote this in January of 1863. The present writer is probably one of the exceedingly few people in the world who have read every word of this tremendous tome. He can advise no other ever to attempt the task. Tougher intellectual work can hardly be imagined. It left a sensation as of beating one's head for a corresponding time against a wall. Yet it was filled with traces of an erratic mind of unusual subtlety and grasp. Briefly, it was the work of a gifted monomanic. But the book was picked up by a few others: and now comes one of them, Mr. Justice Holmes, of the Supreme Court of Missouri, and with another big book, also learned, also able, we are willing to believe, he tries to convince himself and the rest of the world that Mr. William Shakspeare's comedies, histories, and tragedies, published by the said Shakspeare's fellow-actors and business partners, were written by—somebody else, it makes no matter whom. We are willing to believe, as we have said, that Judge Holmes has shown ability and learning in this effort; but we take them on trust; for life is too short to be spent in reading such a book. There is no sadder intellectual spectacle than the one not unfrequently seen—the skilful, earnest, and even honest attempt to prove that that cannot be which is. The starting point of this controversy—if that can be called controversy which provokes no reply—is that William Shakspeare, Stratford yeoman's son and player, could not have had the knowledge and the wisdom necessary to the writing of the plays which bear his name. And to take that as a starting point is at once to beg the whole essential part of the question. Briefly, the evidence—evidence that will stand the most stringent tests—that Shakspeare wrote the plays in question, is better than any that could be produced fifty years hence that Horace Greeley wrote any Tribune leading articles which might be published in a volume after his death by his fellow editors. The question is not one to be entertained, much less refuted. Shakspeare's plays written by Bacon! Better leave out the smoke; and say at once that they were written by Hogg.

When Mr. White comes to read the book for himself, as he will assuredly be obliged to do, he will feel not a little mortified at the recollection of having dealt with it in this dogmatizing strain. Mr. Holmes' theory may be untenable, and the proofs that he submits in its support may be insufficient; but his argument is not a mere exercise of ingenuity. It is prima facie, not only respectable, but formidable, and it will have to be answered by serious reasoning, not by peremptory assertions or careless sneers.

THE ROMANCE OF THE RIVERS.

Oregon and El Dorado; or, The Romance of the Rivers, is the somewhat fanciful title of a new book by Thomas Bulfinch, author of several very entertaining works which, though commonly alluded to as "Juveniles," do not properly belong to that category. The present volume is eminently readable, not the less so perhaps for the fact that the thread of connection by which its various topics are united, is of the slenderest character. The Columbia, the Missouri, the Yellowstone, and the Amazon, are among the rivers that principally figure in the volume, and the adventures and explorations of Lewis and Clarke, of Orellana, Raleigh, Madame Godin, Herndon, and others in connection with them, supply the "romance." Many of the vegetable and animal wonders of the valley of the Amazon are incidentally described in an interesting manner. As a specimen, we quote the following in regard to

THE BIRD-CATCHING SPIDER:

"At Cametá, I chanced to verify a fact relating to the habits of a large, hairy spider of the genus Mygale, in a manner worth recording. The individual was nearly two inches in length of body: but the legs expanded seven inches, and the entire body and legs were covered with coarse gray and reddish hairs. I was attracted by a movement of the monster on a tree-trunk: it was close beneath a deep crevice in the tree, across which was stretched a dense white web. The lower part of the web was broken; and two small birds, finches, were entangled in the pieces. They were about the size of the English siskin; and I judged the two to be male and female. One of them was quite dead: the other lay under the body of the spider, not quite dead, and was smeared with the filthy liquor, or saliva, exuded by the monster. I drove away the spider, and took the birds; but the second one soon died. The fact of a species of mygale sallying forth at night, mounting trees, and sucking the eggs and young of humming-birds, has been recorded long ago by Madame Merian and Palisot de Beauvois; but, in the absence of any confirmation, it has come to be discredited. From the way the fact has been related, it would appear that it had been derived from the report of natives, and had not been witnessed by the narrators I found the circumstance to be quite a novelty to the residents hereabouts.

"The mygales are quite common insects. Some species make their cells under stones; others form artificial tunnels in the earth; and some build their dens in the thatch of houses. The natives call them crab-spiders. The hairs with which they are clothed come off when touched, and cause a peculiar and almost maddening irritation. The first specimen that I killed and prepared was handled incautiously; and I suffered terribly for three days afterward. I think this is not owing to any poisonous quality residing in the hairs, but to their being short and hard, and thus getting into the fine creases of the skin. Some mygales are of immense size. One day, I saw the children belonging to an Indian family who collected for me with one of these monsters, secured by a cord round its waist, by which they were leading it about the house as they would a dog."

The book is published by Tilden & Co. Boston, and is for sale by A. Roman & Co. San Francisco.

A BATCH OF NEW NOVELS.

Far the most charming, to our taste, of all the recent novels, is Mr. Mitchell's Doctor Johns, just republished in book form after its appearance by installments in the Atlantic. No living writer of English that we know of, possesses so much of the charm of Irving's style as Mr. Mitchell, and the few pages of introduction might, so far both as sentiment and expression are concerned, have been written by the author of the Sketch Book himself. Doctor Johns continually reminds us of The Reveries of a Bachelor, and other of Mr. Mitchell's earlier volumes, but it is more robust in tone, and though pervaded by sentiment, has no taint of mere sentimentality.

Novel readers who admire Miss Braddon, and who are chiefly interested by startling incident, and mystery of plot, for whom the graces of style and the vivid portrayal of the finer shades of sentiment, possess no charm, will not become absorbed over the pages of this delightful narrative; indeed we cannot think of a better test of the measure of taste and culture of a novel reader than would be furnished by the question "How do you like Dr. Johns?"

Helen Ford is one those mild and pleasant works of fiction which fastidious parents who entertain a prejudice against "novel reading" may place in the hands of their children with perfect safety. It contains nothing dangerous and nothing exciting. In short, it belongs to the same class of books with those which Mr. T. S. Arthur has for the last ten or fifteen years so regularly produced at brief intervals, though of a somewhat higher literary grade, and not quite so tame as those highly moral tales.

Of altogether a different quality is Mrs. Gore's new book, The Hardships of an Heiress, which, without being sensational, takes hold of the reader's interest in the opening chapter with a powerful grasp, which is not relaxed for an instant until the conclusion is reached. Mrs. Gore's pictures of English life and society impress us as being sketched by a person whose knowledge is derived at first hand, and not from books or from hearsay. In the present volume her cool hand style of character drawing reminds us of Anthony Throlloppe.

Who Breaks Pays, is a story evincing much talent and originality, being quite out of the ordinary conventional line. Those who are tired of the stereotyped sensational novel, or the "novel of society," will find in this curious tale at least the charm of freshness and novelty.

ROSS BROWNE'S NEW BOOK.

Among the most delightful of recent publications, is Ross Browne's new book, An American Family in Germany, with its most acceptable addenda "A Whirl through Algeria" and "A Visit to the Salt Mines of Wieliczka." The charm of the volume is greatly enhanced by the illustrations, which, instead of being furnished in the niggardly spirit that is ordinarily evinced in books advertised as "illustrated," are thrown in with a hand no less liberal than skilful. Mr. Browne is a genuine humorist, of the class whose affiinities are with the school of Irving and "Ik Marvel" rather than of "Doesticks" or "Artemus Ward." His humor has no savor of the negro minstrel variety; it is generally tinged with sentiment or pathos, or suggestive of thought. Where it partakes of the satirical element, it is kindly and catholic in its spirit, never picturing a foible as a crime, or a folly as a sin. At times he reminds you of Hood, and at times of Thackeray. His drollery is never farcical, and his fun is never coarse. In short he belongs to the school of classic humorists who have no relish for the flavor of sawdust.

How the Esquimaux Build Their Houses.—In the winter season the Esquimaux live in huts built of snow; and we may imagine what must have been the necessity and distress that could have first suggested to a human being the idea of using such a material as a means of protecting himself from cold. Be that as it may, the snow igloe affords not only security from the inclemency of the weather, but more comfort than stone or wooden building without fire. The operation requires considerable tact and experience, and is always performed by the men, two being required for it, one out side and the other inside. Blocks of snow are first cut out with some sharp instrument from the spot that is intended to form the floor of the dwelling, and raised on edge, inclining a little inward around the cavity. These blocks are generally about two feet in length, two feet in breadth, and eight inches thick, and are joined close together. In this manner the edifice is erected, contracting at each successive tier until there only remains a small aperture at the top, which is filled by a slap of clear ice, that serves both as keystone to the arch, and a window to light the dwelling. An embankment of snow is raised around the wall, and covered with skins, which answers the double purpose of beds and seats. The inside of the hut presents the figure of an arch or dome; the usual dimensions are ten or twelve feet in diameter, and about eight feet in the centre. Sometimes two or three families congregate under the same roof, having separate apartments communicating with the main building that are used as bedrooms. The entrance to the igloe is effected through a winding covered passage, which stands open by day, but is closed at night by placing slabs of ice at the angle of each bend, and thus the inmates are perfectly secured against the severest cold.

The Royal gondola which Venice is preparing for the king, is to have a crew of eighteen oarsmen. She carries at her prow the Lion of St. Mark, bearing the shield of Savory, and, on the poop, Venice crowning Italy. The sides are covered with sculptures and gilding. In form she resembles the vessels of the ancients. At one end rises a conopy in crimson velvet, lined with azure and embroidered it gold, which constitutes a real throne. The hangings rest upon gilded pillars and are embroidered with gold. In bad weather the whole can be closed by glass doors. In the centre of the gondola rises the Royal ensign.

The iron crown of Lombardy is really a valuable crown—being composed of a broad circle of gold, set with large rubies, emeralds, and sapphires, on a ground of blue and gold enamel. But the most important part of the iron crown, from which it derives its name, is a narrow rim or band of iron three-eights of an inch broad and one-tenth of an inch in thickness, attached to the inner circumference of the circle. This inner band of sacred iron is believed to have been made of one of the nails used at the crucifixion, and accounts for the veneration in which it has been always held.

A Scientific way of lighting pipes and cigars has been recently introduced in Paris, under the name of poudre de feu. It consists of pyropherous, which is preserved in a small tin case with a narrow orifice. When a little of this black powder is poured out on the end of a cigar, or on the tobacco in a pipe stem, and then gently breathed upon, it becomes incandescent, and is in a condition to light the said pipe or cigar.

Lockets.—The favorite lockets at the present time for morning wear are those of quite plain, dull gold, of oval shape, and measuring about one and a half inches, by one inch. A torquoise or any other stone—onyx, for instance—may be placed in the centre of the locket, if desired, but the plain ones are at present in high favor. They are worn on a ribbon of velvet or sarsenet, simply tied tightly round the neck, with a small bow at the back, and very long ends.

The higher you rise the wider is your horizon; so, the more you know the more you will see to know.

AMUSEMENTS.

Maguire's Opera House.—Lady Don has been playing Brough's burlesque of Conrad and Medora all the week, ably supported by the new company, at this theatre. The Daughter of the Regiment, the Married Rake and Simpson & Co., have been given as companion pieces. The new company have been favorably received. Mr. Edwards has proven to be an actor of decided ability in burlesque and excentric characters. The Misses Corcoran are very young and meritorious, and have already won enviable popularity. The elder sister, Miss Julia, is a graceful dancer, and a good singer. Both Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Pardey have shown themselves possessed of good burlesque and comic-acting qualifications. With the efficient aid of Mrs. Judah, and Mrs. Jackson, and Messrs. Leach and Thompson, the company presents a strong force for the representation of musical pieces, burlesques and farces. With Lady Don at its head, with her acknowledged ability and rare vocal qualities, one would think that the attractions were sufficient, but Manager Maguire will produce on Monday evening, in conjunction with the present company, an attraction which, in its line, has never been equalled here, or perhaps in Europe—we allude to the company of Japanese Jugglers that recently arrived here.

At a private rehearsal by the Japanese, given to the representatives of the press, yesterday afternoon, they certainly showed most remarkable ability in jugglery, and unequalled proficiency in gymnastic feats. For instance, the familiar perche feat, which is usually done by the pole being supported in a socket by a band at the waist, is done by a Japanese laying on his back, with his feet extended upright, from the soles of which a long bamboo pole is balanced and supported, up which a stout boy climbs and performs various feats of posturing and balancing. Another feat is performed by the acrobat while lying in the same position. A strong, narrow, circular tub, shaped like a cheese cover, weighing some fifty or sixty pounds, and about five feet in diameter, is balanced on the soles of his feet. The boy mounts this, and small square boxes are from time to time thrown to him, from which he successfully, box by box, erects himself a self sustaining pyramid that reaches, at last, nearly to the top of the theatre. After performing various balancing feats at this break-neck height, he carefully places himself on the very edge of his dangerous perch, and by a sudden movement of man and boy the boxes are tumbled down on the stage, while the boy falls and is caught, unharmed, on the extended feet of the prostrate gymnast. These feats are wonderful and must be seen to be fully appreciated. Ross and Carlo, and the Buislays, the best acrobats and gymnasts we ever had here, never done anything to compare with them.

For the Matinee to-day Conrad and Medora, at half prices to all parts of the house. This evening Blue Jackets and Conrad and Medora.

Metropolitan Theatre.—The ballet of the Star of the Rhine, and the pantomime of The Magician's Gift, were given last evening. The ballet have evinced decidely more talent than the pantomimic portion of the troupe during the last week. The Howson Troupe and Mr. Willie Edouin have presented some clever vaudevilles, well personated, as introductory peices.

Lincoln School Festival.—The Lincoln School Exhibition at Lincoln Hall, on Thursday and Friday evenings, for the purpose of establishing a medal fund, was a decided success, and could be repeated once more with advantage to "the fund." The "Patriotic Song," "Hizekiah Spewkins at the Opera," the "Tableau and Violin Solo," were particularly good. The "Double Ghost," a dialogue in five scenes by the first class, was admirably rendered. The following letter was read by Mr. Hoitt just before the conclusion of the programme of the evening:

Ira G. Hoitt, Esq., Principal of the Lincoln School—Sir: The Directors of the Builders' Insurance Company respond twenty-five dollars to your appeal on behalf of the "Medal Fund." I take the present opportunity to suggest to you, and to other trustees of the moral training of the growing generation, to fill their minds with one golden idea, viz: that it is at once their christian duty and political interest to be hospitable to strangers, especially those who come from Europe—to share with the stranger not only their food but their political privileges. Putting this rule into general practice will inevitably attract to the Pacific slope a great concourse of people, and lay the foundation of a future Republic worthy the attention of history.

Respectfully, Thomas Mooney, President.

San Francisco, Californiа st., Dec. 4th, 1866.

City College Reunion.—On Wednesday evening last the sixth social reunion of the members of the City College was celebrated at Platt's Hall. The affair was one of the most agreeable and recherche of the season.

"Mark Twain."—Our Pacific humorist, "Mark Twain," lectures at Congress Hall on Monday evening next, on which occasion he will repeat his first lecture. As the next steamer will take him East, this may be regarded as the "last chance" for those who wish to hear "Mark" speak his piece.

At Sacramento—Miss Kingsbury has awakened that quiet town into a really creditable state of excitement with her charming, life-like picture of "Fanchon," in The Cricket.

WAVES AND LEAVES.

Waves, waves, waves!
Graceful arches lit with night's pale gold,
Boom like thunder through the mountains rolled,
Hiss, and make their music manifold,
Sing and work for God along the strand.

Leaves, leaves, leaves!
Beautified by Autumn's scorching breath,
Ivory skeletons carven fair by death,
Float and drift at a sublime command.

Thoughts, thoughts, thoughts!
Rolling wave-like on the mind's strange shore,
Rustling leaf-like through it evermore,
Oh, that they might follow God's good hand.

The "Trinity Church Property."—Fresh litigation is to be commenced over the property of Trinity Church, New York. The vast estates of this corporation are now estimated, by the New York Commercial, at sixty millions of dollars. The heirs of Anneke Jans Bogardus have repeatedly questioned the title of the Church during the last one hundred and fifty years.

The title of the heirs is derived from grants given by the government of Holland when the city was New Amsterdam and a portion of the Dutch colony of that name, one of which was a grant given Anneke Jans, widow of Dominie (Minister) Everadus Bogardus, who lost his life by the vessel in which he was a passenger, being wrecked on the coast of Wales while he was acting as special agent and bearer of dispatches from the colonial government to home government of Hollaud. In consideration of his services the government granted his widow and children a farm outside the city wall—now Wall street, New York. For when the war between England and Holland terminated New Amsterdam was ceded to England and become New York. Subsequently the property in question was taken possession of upon the plea of being church property of the Reformed or Protestant Church, and confiscated for the establishment of the Church of England—hence the title "Trinity Church Property."

The Davenport Brothers have given their name to a new figure in quadrilles. Before the last figure a box is brought among the dancers in which each cavalier ensconces himself in turn. The door is then closed, and each lady puts her hand through a hole in the door. If she prefer it she may make use of another hole at the bottom of the door, through which she may put her foot. As soon as a right guess is made by the shut-up cavalier he is released, and takes the lady whose name he has guessed for his partner in the next waltz. This is called an "inuocent game." Very!

Ladies' dresses, abroad, are to be unusually short, according to some authorities, who have looked into the future of 1867 as fashionable Zadkiels. The dresses are to be sans crinoline, and "leave off" sensationally, just below the knees, figured stockings and high boots to do the rest.

Artemus Ward says: "Some kind person has sent me Chawcer's Poems. Mr. C. had talent, but he couldn't spel. No man has a right to be a lit'rary man onless he knows how to spel. It is a pity that Chawcer, who had geneyus, was so unedicated. He is the wuss speller I know of."

The fashions in jewelry are more fantastic than ever. Earrings are composed of a succession of links or horse shoes, graduating in size, the largest at the top, and the lower one coming almost to a point, and touching the shoulder.

He that gives good advice, builds with one hand; he that gives good council and examples, builds with both; but he that gives good admonition and bad examples, builds with one hand and pulls down with another.

Dr. J. C. Ayer has presented to the city of Lowell a magnificent bronze statue of "Victory," which was prepared for the King of Bavaria, to stand at the entrance of his palace in Munich.

What good would centuries do the man who only knows how to waste his time?

Who appreciates the fact that there is any great importance attached to such a commodity as a Pill? It is generally supposed that anybody can make them, as all call can take them. But visit the laboratory of Dr. J. C. Ayer and you will be disabused of the idea, that it is a trifle to make any medicine and adapt it to the wants of millions of men to so adjust it to their needs, and so cure their complaints, as to make them its constant customers in all the zones. Physicians find it requires some skill to adapt their doses to a single patient: ask them if it is not an intricate problem to adjust a purgative pill to the necessities of untold numbers, so that it shall benefit them nearly all. Dr. Ayer's laboratory supplies 60,000 doses of his Pills per diem, or 19,000,000 a year. Think of that Esculapius! Well may it whiten the head of any man to administer to that amount of suffering, and especially when, as is here evident, everything is done with the most extreme nicety and care.—Randolph (Vt.) Statesman.

For the Sick there is nothing which affords such sure and enduring relief as Dr. Bourne's Baths and treatment, at No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 9.

"Medicine Chests always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

Dr. Jamieson, of Edinburgh, affirms that "The present practice of medicine is a reproach to the name of science; while its professors give evidence of an almost total want of the true knowledge of the nature or proper treatment of disease. Nine times out of ten, our mis-called remedies are absolutely injurious to our patients suffering under diseases of whose real character and cause we are most culpably ignoraut."

Dr. Ramage, (Fellow Royal College Physician, London,) thus writes: "It cannot be denied that the present system of medicine is a burning reproach to its professors, if, indeed, a series of vague and uncertain incongruities deserve to be called by that name. How rarely do our medicines do good! How often do they make our patients really worse! I fearlessly assert that in most cases the sufferer would be safer without a physician [a "regular"—Dr. B.] than with one. I have seen enough of the mal-practice of my professional brethren, to warrant the strong language I employ."

Dr. Bourne's Baths and method of curing the sick give universal satisfaction, as the cures are quick, permanent, pleasant, and made without medicines. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

Said the eminent Lugol, of Paris, in a lecture delivered in 1841: "We follow an erroneous course in our investigations, and must resort to some new modes if we desire to be more successful."

Dr. Evans says "The medical practice of our day is at best a most uncertain and unsatisfactory system; it has neither philosophy nor common sense to commend it to confidence."

If You Feel "Bad" on a cold, stormy day, go to Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, and one of his Baths will make you feel "good." Stormy weather is the very time to truly enjoy them and get rid of your colds, cougbs, rheumatism, etc.

The Dublin Medical Journal of 1842 discourses on this wise: "As surely the uncertain and most unsatisfactory art that we call medical science, is no science at all, but a jumble of inconsistent opinions, of conclusions hastily and often incorrectly drawn, of facts misunderstood or perverted, of comparisons without analogy, of hypothesis without reason, and theories not only useless, but dangerous."

Magendie: "Let us no longer wonder at the lamentable want of success which marks our practice when there is scarcely a sound physiological principle among us."

John Mason Good: "The science of medicine is a barbarous jargon, and the effects of our medicines on the human system are in the highest degree uncertain, except that they have already destroyed more lives than war, pestilence and famine combined!"

Fever and Ague.—Persons who are suffering from this horrible disease, if they place themselves under Dr. Bourne's care, on the "well day," seldom or ever have another chill, and the disease is eradicated from the system in from ten to twenty days—not patched, to return again—without medicines, and in a manner altogether pleasant and agreeable. No other physician can make such statement truthfully. Apply at No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

California Macaroni.—Several years ago the manufacture of Macaroni on a small scale was commenced on Sansome street, between Jackson and Pacific, as an experiment. The advantages possessed by the fresh made Macaroni over the imported article, deteriorated by long sea voyages, were soon recognized, and the demand for the fresh local manufactured Macaroni since its first introduction has steadily increased. Recently the proprietors have been again compelled to enlarge their facilities for the manufacture of this wholesome food—recommended by the best physicians of Europe as the most healthy and beneficial of all farinaceous commodities, and especially adapted to the diet of the invalid and dyspeptic. The properties have ever been careful in procuring a certain kind of wheat, by which they are enabled to supply the trade with a fresher and finer quality of Macaroni than any imported, and at lower rates. Farina, from which all kinds of Macaroni is manufactured, made into soup, and the different Italian dishes, is not only a healthy food for adults, but is also the most healthy substitute for milk, used in nurseries. Where impure milk is so common as in our midst, it would be well for heads of families and physicians to introduce fresh manufactured Farina as the most strengthening of all kinds of nourishment for the healthy, the dyspeptic, or for mothers who are not able, physically, to nurse their young. It is a well known fact that the Italians very seldom become dyspeptic—Macaroni being their principal food. It would require more space than can be spared in a simple newspaper item, to sketch the history and growth of the extensive Macaroni manufacturing establishment of Messrs. Brignardelli, Macchiavello & Co. At some future time we intend to give detailed account of the extent, business and importance of this, the only Macaroni manufactory on the Pacific Coast. *

Great Reduction in Ladies' Dress and Dry Goods.—The telegraph has informed us of the recent fall of prices in dress and dry goods in the New York market; and we are authorized to announce that the retail house of Meagher, Taaffe & Co., of this city, in consequence of the dry goods tumble at the East, will open the coming week with a great reduction in the prices of their immense stock of goods; which will be marked down to lower rates than dry goods have ever been sold for for years back, as an especial bid for the great Holiday trade, and as the most effective means of reducing their large stock on hand.

The goods reduced in prices consist of ladies' dress goods—silks, empress cloths of every variety, poplins, cashmeres, merinos, alpacas, and prints—which will be reduced from twenty-five to forty per cent. Cloaks and shawls will also be marked down to remarkable low rates. Among the latter are some rich and beautiful real camel's-hair India shawls; and, also, all kinds of domestic and housekeeping goods. Nor will the class of ornamental goods escape the reduction. We are assured that real point laces by the set or yard, and rich chantilla flounces and laces, lace curtains, etc., will be offered at figures greatly lower than they can be purchased elsewhere.

Of course this event will create a commotion in the dry goods trade, and thronged counters and a rush of purchasers will be the effect of it. And the grand result will be that the ladies will be most happy in procuring new and fashionable goods at such bargains; and the enterprising house of Meagher, Taaffe & Co. will get most of the Holiday trade, make hundreds of new customers, and convert their immense stock of goods now on hand into cash. *

A FIRESIDE STORY—TOLD BY THE POKER.

THE hearthrug ought to tell this story, because she had much more to do with it than I had. But, spread out there before the fire from morning to night, she thinks only of making herself comfortable, and I daresay considers it a hardship to be shaken out of her drowsy self-sufficiency even once in the twenty-four hours. So if the story is never told till the hearthrug takes to story-telling, nobody, I fancy, is ever likely to be the better for listening to it. I tell this story simply for the benefit and warning of domineering wives in particular, and in the interests of husbands in general; and I adhere to my original opinion, that the hearthrug ought to have told it.

Should the observation I am going to make at starting happen to be repeated within hearing of any individual following the same calling as myself, he will, I am sure, understand in a moment my feelings when I say that my mistress' face, in fact her person altogether, is such a one as a drawing-room poker reflects with warm and invariable satisfaction. As to her other good qualities, I shall not express my own opinion, which might be open to the suspicion of partiality, but shall report rather that of Mr. John Thomas the footman in his own words, uttered one morning while he was in the act of putting coals on the fire, a moment after she had left the room: "By George! master's a lucky man to have such a wife! If I was sure Amelia Catharine" (upper housemaid, equally good-looking and well-conducted) "would make me such another, blow me if I wouldn't marry her without even asking to see her savings'-bank book!" Mr. John Thomas had lived in many other families, and was therefore qualified to speak knowingly on such a subject. My own impression is, that his admiration of his mistress, in her capacity of wife of his master, is abundantly justified. Of Mr. Silver, my master, I have only to say that, though he is a member of the Stock Exchange and any thing but a saint, he is certainly not at all a bad sort of gentleman. He uses me a little roughly at times; but if it were not that in doing so he makes his wife start unpleasantly on her chair, I should not object to be so treated—should rather like it, in fact. That they are a thoroughly happy pair is what any one would soon discover who had my opportunities for observing them together—a privilege I have used judiciously, and without a suspicion of impertinence, I hope I may safely say, for very little short of ten years: to be precise, from about the seventh day after their return from their honeymoon trip, when my mistress took formal possession of her home, and sent my rusty predecessor traveling on the way of all old iron.

Premising that from my recumbent position on the fender I saw and heard every thing I am about to relate, this is my story:

Fires had not yet been begun in the drawing-room, but, from the force of habit I suppose, Mrs. Silver, when there was no company, would sit reading or at work by the side of the fireplace while her husband went for a ride after dinner, which he did very often in the summer twilight. One evening while thus seated alone, I noticed that she paused reflectively, and presently I heard her say:

"No, no; I'll not remind him. To say to him, 'My love, for the first time in ten years you have forgotten the return of our wedding day,' might sound like a reproach. No; neither tears nor reproaches belong to a day from which date ten years of tranquil happiness. I am sure his forgetfulness arises from no want of love for me. Active and occupied as he is, I know how many other things he has to think of. If he had remembered—well, it would have been very delightful. However, since he has chanced to forget, let me reflect that his memory might be as retentive as that of the almanac, and yet he might not love me. No; if I avenge his forgetfulness, it shall be in my own way—by making the fireside of which he is so fond more than usually pleasant to him this evening."

Mrs. Silver smiled and resumed her work, which that evening was a handsome smoking cap she was embroidering for master; but I certainly saw the beginning of a tear in one of her eyes—the one nearest to me.

"The other day," she continued, meditatively, "he was regretting that the old custom of having hot suppers had passed away. I've a good mind to surprise him with one to-night! Yes, I will do it! But what shall it be?—what is he specially fond of?"

I beg here to be allowed to say that though I have never had any other mistress than the lady whose behavior I am now describing, a poker who for ten years has been in the very best middle-class society, and who has assisted at the reading aloud of all the fashionable novels and a few of the most interesting divorce cases, is able to understand the exact difference between the best and the worst of wives.

"Ah! I know what I will order!" cried my mistress, after a long pause; "a lobster rissole, a roasted chicken, and a lemon-pudding. That shall be my great revenge."

She was just about to ring the bell, when the drawing room door was suddenly opened, and a lady friend of hers, too much agitated to stand on ordinary ceremony, flounced into the room, exclaiming in tones which reminded me of the grating of a file—with which inharmonious noise I had been painfully familiar at an earlier part of my career—for even a poker can attest the truth of the French proverb, il faut souffrir pour etre beau

"My dear, I knew you were at home, so I came up—only for a moment. Don't disturb yourself. I've no time to sit down. I'm boiling over with indignation!"

"Dear me!" replied my mistress.

"Quite as much on your account as on my own, my love!" cried Mrs. Toovey, throwing herself on to the ottoman in the centre of the room, and untying her bonnet-strings almost fiercely.

"It's very good of you, I'm sure," said my mistress.

"You may smile, my love, but it's no smiling matter for all that, I can assure you," cried Mrs. Toovey.

"Not tragic, I hope?"

"I don't know that!" replied Mrs. Toovey, whisking her shawl out of the way, and plunging her hand into the pocket of her dress. "Do you know this handwriting?" Mrs. Toovey held out a letter to my mistress, as if it had been a cup of poison.

"I've no doubt it's my husband's," said my mistress, without taking it out of Mrs. Toovey's hand.

"Read it, my dear, read it!" cried that indignant lady.

"Pray excuse me; I see it is addressed to Mr. Toovey," my mistress said gently.

"O," cried Mrs. Toovey, "take my word for it, you'll some day repent of indulging in such silly scruples. A husband and wife are one, and the wife cannot too often or too emphatically remind her husband of the fact. At least you'll not refuse to listen to the contents of this atrocious document?"

I don't think any refusal would have induced Mrs. Toovey to defer the reading of the letter for a single moment. She read:

"My dear Job, the supper party of to-night, married and single, may count on me, even to the extent of an adjournment to Cremorne. I shall not say any thing about the affair to my wife, who would be fancying all sorts of dreadful consequences inevitable. SILVER.

"There, my dear! what do you say to that?" demanded Mrs. Toovey, refolding the letter with a spiteful jerkiness of action, and putting it back into her pocket, as if for further use.

"I say that I am much obliged to Mr. Silver for the thoughtful care he had taken to keep me in ignorance of what he fancied it might be unpleasant for me to know."

Mrs. Toovey gave herself so sharp a twist on the ottoman, that I wonder she did not lose her balance and tumble off.

"Really, my dear," she cried, "you—I must say—you make the blood curdle in my veins! You appear so wilfully blind that, positively, if I didn't know you have been married to the man for ten years, I should fancy you were still in love with your husband."

"Your imagination would not lead you in the least astray," answered my mistress, quietly smiling; "I daresay I ought to be very much ashamed to make such a confession. But don't for a moment suppose that my love for my husband is of the high romantic kind; it never was that. He did not run away with me in a midnight storm of thunder and lightning, and marry me in spite of all the world, his parents and mine included. Time, if it has made me acquainted with his faults, has also taught me to bear with them without disgust, impatience, or weariness. There is nothing to be surprised at in the continuance of such a love as mine—entirely unromantic, jog-trot, you see. Such as it, the sort of love I now feel for my husband, I hope to feel for him when my hair is gray, without blushing to confess it."

Mrs. Toovey tied her bonnet-strings as tightly as if her chin had been a package of hardware, and she had been cording it for exportation.

"My dear," she cried, "I can hardly trust myself to say what I think; but this I will say: if any wife ever went the way to spoil her husband, you are going exactly that way now. Patience with his faults, indeed! Mr. Toovey, I daresay, would be delighted to find me patient with his—and heaven knows he has enough of them! But that is not my nature. I know my duty as a woman of intellect a little better than that! Why, my love, I have just come from having a scene with him about this shocking letter of your husband's. I made him confess everything: that after supper the whole party are to go to Cremorne. Are they! 'Mr. Toovey,' I said, 'you dare to go, and I'll follow you!' What is the result? Mr. Toovey has learned that when I say a thing I mean it. He has promised me he will not think of going, after my prohibition. Do, my love, let me give you some advice on the way to manage your husband."

"O, certainly, if it will afford you any satisfaction to do so," replied my mistress, with a good-natured little laugh.

"You won't laugh, my dear," said Mrs. Toovey, "when you find out, some day, that another woman has carried off your husband's affections; and not only his affections, but his fortune—for that's what commonly happens now. However, I see plainly enough you are prepared to despise my advice, and to laugh at my solemn warning. So be it. But, take my word for it, you'll find too soon what cause you have for repentance."

"I hope not. Really, my dear, you seem determined to imagine my husband a second Lovelace. You forget that he is not a young man of twenty."

"Good heavens, Mrs. Silver!" exclaimed Mrs. Toovey; "what have their ages to do with it?"

"Well, even if that is so," replied my mistress, smiling; "my husband is as ungallant a man as you could name."

"To you, perhaps, my love," answered the amiable Toovey, with her sweetest smile. If it had been winter, and I had happened to be red-hot, I should have been strongly tempted to throw myself at the lady's feet, and set fire to her at this particular moment.

"To you also, dear; for, you remember, it is only a few days ago you were complaining of his 'shocking want of politeness.'"

"Very likely; but his rudeness to me is easily accounted for. It is because I give you what he considers ill advice; which means that he fears to lose the power he now enjoys of tyrannizing over you at his pleasure."

"My dear, have you ever written a sensation novel?" asked my mistress, with an arch smile playing about the corners of her mouth.

"What do you mean by that?"

"You have such a vivid imagination; the portrait you have drawn of my husband so much resembles that of a romance-hero," replied my mistress.

"Pray let us drop the subject," cried Mrs. Toovey. "Positively your notions are an outrage to common sense."

"I'm sure, my dear, I hope to be forgiven. You see the scope of my mind is so very prosaic; you'll think so, no doubt, when I tell you that at the moment you came I was busy planning a little unromantic hot supper for my Blue Beard—especially a lemon-pudding, of which I know he is particularly fond?"

"You'll find you have had your labor for your pains, for he will certainly not be at home to partake of it."

"My own impression is that he will," said my mistress gently. "Will you and your husband drop in at ten o'clock?"

"With pleasure, my dear; for I am sure you will be alone, and glad of sympathetic company. Do, my love, allow me to remonstrate with your husband, if you don't feel equal to the task yourself."

"No, no; pray don't do any thing of the sort!" cried my mistress hastily. "You are not so well acquainted with my husband as I am, and might do more harm than good."

"Just as you please, my dear," said Mrs. Toovey, starting to her feet, and pulling her shawl about her shoulders with a spasmodic action of the hands. "Just as you please, of course; though I did not think I was quite such a fool as you appear to consider me."

Saying which Mrs. Toovey flounced out of the room even more impetuously than she had flounced into it.

"The foolish creature!" said my mistress, after she was gone; "it is no fault of hers if she hasn't made me very uncomfortable; and all with the best intentions. Those best intentions! What would she not have said if she had known that to-day is my wedding-day? But I am sure my husband does not care to go to this supper-party. He has been drawn into it; and if he had declined to go, might have been rallied on being under petticoat dominion. I know I have only to say to him, 'I wish you would not go out to-night;' but I will not say it, for there is a tyranny of gentleness as well as of unkindness."

She paused for a moment or two; and then, as if an idea had come into her head, she rang the bell.

"I should like him to remain at home this evening," she continued; "but if he does so, it shall be from the prompting of his own feelings alone. John, bring your master's dressing-gown and cigar-case."

She said this to Mr. John Thomas as she passed out of the drawing-room. In the course of a few minutes her orders had been obeyed. Almost immediately afterwards my master returned; and Mrs. Toovey, calling again at the same time, they came into the room together.

"I can't help it, Mr. Silver," she said, "if what I say isn't pleasant for you to hear. I repeat that you are setting my husband a bad example; and I have told him that I will not allow him to have any thing to do with the supper-party to-night."

"Very well, my dear madam!" cried my master impatiently; "if Toovey likes you to lead him by the nose, that's his affair; it wouldn't suit me."

"Possibly; but you'll allow me to say that I don't believe there's another woman in the world who would put up with such behavior as your wife has borne with hitherto. Do not suppose, however, that she will submit to your tyranny for ever. You are greatly mistaken if you imagine she will let you go to this scandalous party to-night. Poor thing," she said aside; "I must defend her in spite of herself."

"Confound it, Mrs. Toovey!" cried my master; "I wish you'd mind your own business, and not drive me into saying disagreeable things to you."

"I have only one more remark to make, Mr. Silver," said Mrs. Toovey; "it is to request that you will not hold any further communication with my husband; I'll not have him corrupted by your bad example."

"Go to ——"

I don't think my master named any final destination for Mrs. Toovey, who sailed out of the room with more anger than dignity.

"Hang the woman!" exclaimed my master, ringing the bell, as if that were the order of execution; I can't imagine how Job Toovey manages to get along with her. What the deuce does she want here?—filling my wife's head with a lot of rubbish, I'll be bound."

Mr. John Thomas came in answer to the bell.

"See that my evening dress is all ready," said my master sharply.

"Evening dress, sir? mistress told me to bring your dressing-gown—"

"Who is master here? Go instantly and do as I tell you!" cried my master.

"Yes, sir—of course, sir," cried Mr. John Thomas in a bewildered state of mind, in which condition he hurried from the room.

"I see what has happened," said my master, as soon as he was left alone. "I'm to be put into leading-strings. Not yet. Laura ought by this time to know that I love her with all my heart, but that I am master of my own actions; and, egad, I intend to remain so!"

My mistress came back into the room, and saw at a glance that Mr. Silver had been put out of temper by something. But she said, as if quite unconscious of any thing being the matter:

"Have you enjoyed your ride, love?"

"Pretty well," answered my mistress, drily. "There is no objection to my going out for an hour's ride in the evening, I hope?"

"Objection?—expressly ordered by your doctor, dear."

"An intention of mine to go out to supper this evening appears to be not equally unobjectionable?"

"My love!"

"At any rate, Mrs. Toovey—"

"My dear Edward," said my mistress, interrupting him; Mrs. Toovey is—Mrs. Toovey; whom, I am sure you will allow, I do not in any way resemble."

"I am happy to say you don't," replied my master; "but why do you encourage her visits?"

"If you recollect, you yourself particularly requested me to cultivate her acquaintance, for the sake of her husband—one of your oldest and most intimate friends."

"I beg you pardon, dear; I was wrong," said my master, a little pettishly. "The fact is, the woman's a tittle-tattler, and may be a mischief-maker."

"She has done nothing but good in the present instance; since I owe to her the knowledge of the pains you had taken to keep from me a something which you thought it would be uncomfortable for me to learn."

My master was evidently embarrassed. "Then, my darling," he stammered, "my going to this supper does not vex you?"

"In one respect, a little bit; in another, not at all."

"Might I ask you to explain?" inquired my master, relapsing in the smallest degree into his recent ill-humor.

"O," cried my mistress, laughing pleasantly, "you don't expect me to declaim you a speech like a heroine in a melodrama? By the way, that reminds me of something I can do. Would you mind putting on your dressing-gown for a moment? I want to see how this cap, which I am embroidering for you, will go with it."

"Would I mind?" cried my master, taking off his walking-coat and slipping into his dressing-gown; "why it's a positive pleasure to find an excuse for putting it on. I should like never to wear any thing else."

"That will do, I think," said my mistress, after comparing the new cap with the old dressing-gown. "You may take it off now."

"There's no need for hurry," replied my master, throwing himself comfortably into a favorite chair; "I shall not start for this precious supper for an other hour. But you were saying that my going out vexed you in one way, though not in an other."

"I meant that I would rather have had you at home this evening, because I had planned a nice little hot supper for you—a lobster rissole, a roasted chicken, and a dainty lemon-pudding."

"A lemon-pudding!" cried my master.

"But now I'll tell you why I do not mind your going out to supper; it's because I know you will get no wine so good as that in your own cellar; no lemon-pudding so nice as the one I've had made for you, even if you get any at all; because you'll have to wear what you call 'a choker' instead of your dressing-gown—have your ears split with noisy conversation—be bored to death with frothy politics—and have no opportuty, however much you may wish for it, for saying to your wife, 'Laura, I love you better than any thing else in the world.'"

What my master did is what I really believe every man in his senses would have done under the circumstances. In other words, he put his arm round his wife's waist and kissed her.

"You see I must go, Laura," he said, not quite apropos; "I've promised 'em."

I fancied that I detected just the faintest shade of disappointment fall upon my mistress' face; but she said quite cheerfully:

"By all means, dear; and if you would like to oblige me, there is one particular neck-tie I should like you to wear to-night. I'll fetch it."

She left the room, and in a few minutes returned with a handsome white neck-tie, beautifully embroidered at the ends.

"Why," exclaimed my master, "this is the one I wore on my wedding-day! And you are really going to let me wear it when you will not even be present?"

"I think you'll own it's very magnanimous of me," answered my mistress, with a very significant twinkle in her eyes; "but quite in accordance with my ordinary heroism of character; and, of course, without a thought in my head of having the lemon-pudding all to myself. But what are you doing? I declare you've made a perfect rope of it round your neck!"

"By Jove! I've done worse—I've torn it!" cried my master.

"You have indeed," replied my mistress. "Ah, well, it's ten years old."

"Ten years old? Good heavens, Laura—what's the day of the month?" demanded my master; and then, without waiting to be answered, he threw himself at her feet, exclaiming: "Beat me, my darling! I deserve it; thoughtless, ungrateful brute that I am! A day that was the beginning of so much happiness entirely forgotten! Put away the dear old neck-tie; I shall sup with you, love. Let them wait for me if they like. Half an hour ago I was an ass, making myself and you uncomfortable for fear some people I don't care a pin for should think I preferred your society to theirs—ashamed of my own happiness, in fact. Let them think I am governed by my wife! You do govern me, Laura; I know it; and it shall always be my glory to own the influence of your goodness, kindness, and gentleness. You are the fountain-head of all my happiness; and if it is ridiculous for a man to confess that he loves his wife better than all else in the world, let me appear the most ridiculous of husbands. Laugh with me, Laura! Why, my darling, you are crying!"

Something at that moment affected my sight; but I have no doubt that what my master said was literally true. Some time later, Mr. John Thomas opened the door to announce the return of Mrs. Toovey, but the lady herself entered before he had time to pronounce her name. She appeared both surprised and disgusted to see that pretty little picture of domestic felicity.

"What!" she exclaimed; "are you not gone?"

"No; I am going to sup at home," replied my master.

"When all the rest are gone?" cried Mrs. Toovey. "Ridiculous!"

"Good heavens!" he cried, bursting into laughter; "there's no being in agreement with you, Mrs. Toovey. Half an hour ago you quarrelled with me for proposing to go; now you quarrel with me for not going."

"But your husband, dear?" inquired my mistress.

"Gone, my love! Gone, in spite of all I could do or say to prevent him, after flying into the most dreadful passion, and terrifying me almost to death. I can't understand it at all. It's as if he had suddenly become quite another man—a lion, my love."

And Mrs. Toovey threatened to go instantaneously into hysterics, in proof of the terrible change that had come over her hitherto submissive "lord and master." It required a great deal of persuasion on the part of my mistress to get her to give up the idea of the hysterics in the first place, and in the next, of going to Cremorne to confront her peccant husband, "in the shockingest hansom I can find," as she said.

As to my master's suggestion, that in dealing with the wild beasts called husbands, wives may, in some cases, find coaxing to do better than coercion, she emphatically pooh-poohed it, even after a second help of the lemon-pudding at supper—nay, even after more than one glass of cold punch.

I will only say in conclusion, that's my story. If the hearth-rug could have told it better, why didn't she tell it?—Belgravia.

THE LUNCH.

A GOTHIC window, where a damask curtain
Made the blank daylight shadowy and uncertain;
A slab of agate on four eagle talons,
Held trimly up, and neatly taught to balance;
A porcelain dish, o'er which in many a cluster
Plump grapes hung down, dead ripe, and without lustre;
A melon cut in thin, delicious slices;
A cake that seemed mosaic work in spices;
Two china cups, with golden tulips sunny,
And rich inside with chocolate like honey;
And she and I the banquet scene completing
With dreamy words, and very pleasant eating.

CANDOR, in some people, may be compared to lemon drops, in which the acid predominates over the sweetness.

THE VIRTUE OF LUXURY.

THE publication in a respectable journal of an open defence of luxury, luxury in its vulgar meaning and including wastefulness, is an incident of the week worth recording, for it marks a point, it may be a turning-point, in the reaction against asceticism which has been carried on ever since 1852. From believing luxury an evil in itself we have come round to consider it a good. The one state of opinion is as unsound as the other, and likely to be far more injurious to society. No doubt many of the old arguments against luxury in dress, eating, housekeeping, and every form not involving directly moral considerations, were often erroneous or absurd. Self-denial which does no good to others or to the ascetic's own mind can only be made a virtue by a perversion or confusion of thought. A man may as well waste a guinea on a toy he does not want, as add it to a hoard he will not use, provided always the act of wasting does not injure his own mind more than the act of hoarding. To go without sugar when you want sugar and can afford sugar, simply because you like sugar, is as useless a proceeding as it would be to prick yourself sharply twice a day because the body would not like that. But that does not prove that unlimited indulgence in sugar up to the point of luxury is good. On the contrary, it may be bad for health and economy.

Expenditure on silk, say, does not necessarily injure a country, the manufacture of silk being as useful as any other; but that does not prove that luxurious expenditure on silk may not be economically wrong. Every outlay not directly reproductive is an outlay of so much power, and there must be and is a point at which needless outlay—and all luxury involves needless—must be as injurious as any other form of waste. There is no injury to the country in an expenditure on liquor, but there must be a point at which that expenditure unduly restricts the power of expending upon things more useful or beneficial than artificial stimulents. Take the commonest case of all, the consumption of tobacco, a thing nearly not absolutely needed. The country is not injured economically by that expenditure as long as the return in pleasure, or refreshment, or trade paid for by the planter is equal to the toil expended in buying the weed; but there must be a point at which the equality ceases, and the expenditure is then waste of so much toil which might be better directed.

The true moral objection to luxury is, we think, not its "enervating" effect, which is doubtful, or its effects in "loosening" the bonds of the mind, for it may strengthen some of them, but the disturbance it creates as to the true objects of life and living. Let many women in great places indulge in extravagance of dress, and instantly an expensive mode of dressing becomes each woman's object, is elevated to an unreal and absurd importance in the scale of her life. But what then? it is replied,—all objects are unimportant if viewed in one way, everything is comparative, and why should not a woman seek to excel in apparel as, say, in social influence? Simply because, though each end may be equally worthless,—and there are ends not worthless,—the effort towards one acts as a relaxation diminishing true strength, the strain to the other as a discipline increasing strength. It is not more worth while to jump further than anybody else than it is to sleep longer than anybody else, but to accomplish the jump the body must be trained in a way which strengthens it for all real work, and to acquire a habit of sleep must be trained in a way which weakens it for all real work.

The habit of luxury blinds the mind to true proportions, elevates things comparatively valueless into things of positive value. Whenever it does not, luxury ceases to be, and becomes mere grandeur, or splendour, or custome. A man may live like Sardanapalus, but if he does not want to live so, and simply accepts such living as an accident, or as the atmosphere around him, luxury will not hurt him. One man may eat off silver and another off delf, and the delf owner be tho more truly luxurious of the two, that is, spends more of himself in caring about what he eats off. The charge brought by sensible men against the luxuriousness of the hour is not that it enervates, for it does not, or that it costs money, for wastefulness is a question of comparison, but that it lowers the standard of life, confuses and perplexes the motive forces which impel mankind. Let the Marquise de la Folie dress in cloth of gold if she likes, and there is, if she can afford it, no harm done, unless the said cloth is opposed to good taste or diminishes her own beauty; but when life is sacrificed to gold cloth, when it becomes a paramount object to have gold cloth, and ambition means much gold cloth, and emulation the best gold cloth, and pride pleasure in her gold cloth, then life is lowered, in our own judgment greatly lowered, but by universal consent lowered in some degree Anything that increases that process is bad, and the surly moralists who protest against luxury are distinctly in the right. No doubt they overdo their case.

Luxury palls so very fast that it seldom endures as luxury, either sinks into its proper place in life, or produces a reaction towards asceticism as a relief. Let luxury in dress go as far as it will, some one is sure sooner or later to discover that it injures beauty or manliness, and discarding it, to change the current of ambition, or emulation, or taste towards simplicity.

At this present moment luxury in France, America, and even England has advanced till it is, we believe, in spite of our contemporary, becoming mischievous. Men, and still more women, make of outward luxury a passion, till they expend toil and mental force and life itself to gratify it, feel delight when their equipages are the finest, their plate the heaviest, their wines the most expensive, till in fact mere surroundings have become part of themselves, absorb and stifle all that is nobler in them. To "rise" is to have rich things, to "shine" to have their richest things, to "succeed" to have immensely rich things, and to "fail" to give up rich things or not to get them. There is no harm in the rich things, any more than there is in pigs' food, but to want them as pigs want swill is to be piggish without the excuse of a pig's nature, is to the individual degradation, to society an injury—Spectator.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1866.

Black Sheep.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued in to-day's Californian.

AN UNFORTUNATE CITY.

THERE seems to be no exaggeration at all in the statement that the city of New York is governed by an organized association of thieves and robbers. The abuses that prevail there, and in regard to the existence of which there is no dispute whatever, are more outrageous even than those under which San Francisco suffered in her darkest days. Not only the Times, the Tribune, and all the better class of the weeklies are loud and bitter in their denunciations of the "Corporation Ring," but the Herald is quite as severe in its accusations of wholesale and shameless corruption as any of its contemporaries. Says Harper's Weekly:

"On every side and in every detail the municipal Government is an organized system of plunder. In 1830 the city was governed for half a million of dollars. In 1865 the entire government cost more than forty millions. In 1830 the population was a little more than 200,000. It is now about 1,000,000. Thus while the population is five times larger, the cost of governing it is sixteen times greater."

As a neat specimen of municipal swindling, take the annual job of getting up the "Manual of the Common Council." This is an utterly unnecessary book. It does not fall at all within the legitimate province of a city government to get up such a book, and the only object for doing it is of course the profits arising out of the chances for jobbing and contracting connected with it. Yet for this useless book, adorned with the fac-simile autograph signatures of the Aldermen, the taxpayers of New York paid the sum of $57,000 in 1865!

But besides these enterprises on a large scale, the corporation robbers do not disdain petty spoliations upon all persons holding subordinate offices in the city government, and even upon female teachers in the Public Schools. Mr. Parton, who seems to have thoroughly investigated the subject, exposes the bald and undisguised iniquity of the New York municipal government in an elaborate article in the October number of the North American Review, supplying abundance of details, and showing specifically how the machinery of corruption and plunder is worked. Here are a few of the facts he furnishes:

"It was recently proved, in the presence of the Governor of the State, that the appointment to the office of Corporation Attorney was sold to one incumbent for the round sum of $10,000. This is bad enough, but worse remains to be told. Sworn testimony (from thirty-six witnesses) taken by a committee of investigation, establishes the appalling fact, that appointments to places in the public schools are systematically sold in some of the wards—the wards where the public schools are almost the sole civilizing power, and where it is of unspeakable importance that the schools should be in the hands of the best men and women. One young lady, who had just buried her father and had a helpless mother to support, applied for a situation as teacher, and was told, as usual, that she must pay for it. She replied that she could not raise the sum demanded, the funeral expenses having exhausted the family store. She was then informed that she could pay "the tax" in installments. Another poor girl came on the witness-stand on crutches, and testified that she had paid $75 for a situation of $300 a year. Another lady went to a member of the Ring, and told him, with tears, that she saw no way of procuring the sum required, nor even of saving it from the slender salary of the place. The man was moved by her anguish, took compassion upon her, and said he would remit his share of "the tax." It was shown, too, that the agent of all this foul iniquity was no other than the principal of one of the schools. It was he who received and paid over the money wrung from the terror and necessities of underpaid and overworked teachers. We learn from the report of the committee that the Ring in this ward was originally formed for the express purpose of giving the situations in a new and handsome school "to the highest bidder;" and, as the opening of the new school involved the discharge of a small number of teachers employed in the old schools, the Ring had both the fear and the ambition of the teachers to work upon. 'There was a perfect reign of terror in the ward,' says the report of the investigating committee. 'The agent performed his duty with alacrity and with a heartiness worthy of the employers. It appears that he not only summoned the teachers to come to him, but that he called on their parents and friends as to the amount they should pay for their appointments—the sums varying from $50 to $600, according to the position sought.'

"And who were the Ring who perpetrated this infamy? They were a majority of the Trustees elected by the people, and the School Commissioner elected by the people—six poor creatures, selected from the grog shop and the wharf, and intrusted with the most sacred interest of a republic, the education of its children. It was known before that in some of the wards the school trustees were drunkards; it was known before that little children were piled up, like flower pots in a green-house, in small, ill-ventilated rooms, but no one supposed, before this investigation in 1864, that men could be elected to office who were capable of such revolting meanness as this.

The New York Nation, the rival of the Round Table for the position of the leading Atlantic literary weekly, says, in referring to the subject, that the same causes that have led to this shameful condition of things in New York are producing similar effects in all the chief cities of the United States wherever "commerce and manufactures are creating great aggregations of people," and predicts that if some remedy is not applied, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati and San Francisco will be governed by "bands of thieves" like those who now hold their sessions in the City Hall.

The source of the evil, according to the Nation, is to be found in the large number of ignorant foreign voters gathered together in our large cities, the existence of which political element has created a new class of politicians of the type of Fernando Wood—keen, cunning, unscrupulous Americans, "determined to live on the public, and ready to do anything that may be necessary for the purpose—men who have thoroughly trained themselves in the art of cajoling the Irish—have learned all their foibles and prejudices, and pander to them with unequalled dexterity, and are utterly indifferent to public opinion." Under the leadership of men of this class, the 77,000 foreign voters of New York (being nearly two-thirds of the entire number of voters, which is 129,000) have controlled municipal affairs for more than twenty years, making the officers and revenue of the city the spoil and patrimony of their favorites.

So far as the existence and magnitude of the evil are concerned, there seems to be no difference of opinion whatever among the respectable portion of the New York Press; but when it comes to the consideration of a remedy, all is embarrassment and confusion. Mr. Parton seems at one moment to incline to the suggestion of interference by the State Legislature, and at another to a restriction of the right of suffrage to those who can "read English composition of medium difficulty;" but he thinks that present relief by the interposition of the Legislature is a necessity. The Evening Post is of the opinion that a remedy could be found in abolishing the plan of choosing municipal officers by popular vote, with the single exception of the Mayor, who should have full power of appointment and dismissal so far as all the other offices are concerned, and be held responsible for all evils and abuses. The Nation has no faith in any changes of this kind, and thinks that no safety can be found for large American cities "in any other way than by raising the character of those who elect city officers;" it urges that the Constitutional Convention of the State should "impose a good and thorough educational test on all persons presenting themselves for registration, giving those who are now voters a year to prepare in; and, secondly, give householders, as householders, a share in the representation, with at least a veto on votes of money made by the representatives of mere numbers."

This last plan would at least have the good effect of making political influence in some measure proportionate to intelligence, and would also tend to induce those on whom the burdens of taxation chiefly fall, to take an active interest in city politics.

We have dwelt at unusual length upon this subject, because the evils and abuses in question are not peculiar to New York, but threaten every other great commercial city in the country, where similar causes are in operation. San Francisco has had experiences of her own, not altogether unlike those of her great sister on the Atlantic, and it would not be prudent to consider her yet beyond all peril of their recurrence.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE W. W. STORY QUESTION AGAIN.

To the Editor of the Californian:

SOME one in your last week's issue, using the same initials that I use, speaks of the late "Chief Justice" Story. Will some one please inform your readers when or where Judge Story was a Chief Justice?

In regard to W. W. Story's having denationalised himself, I have a theory, although I do not know the fact that he has been naturalised as an Englishman. In the first place, there has always been a snobbish admiration and imitation of England about Boston and Virginia, but the peculiar attraction of Mr. Story to England belongs especially to Puritan and Abolition New England.

England is the father of the "man and brother" idea, and boasts that no slave can breathe upon her soil, etc., etc.

Now, from many small circumstances, I am led to think that the Sculptor Story is a practical and instinctive believer in the equality or superiority of the African race, and this may have had something to do with his making himself an Englishman.

Mrs. Beecher Stowe and the whole Atlantic Monthly clique are all the time praising his instincts and his manhood; and it seems that he does possess that peculiar erotic and morbid state of mind or body which ignores or repudiates the normal, healthy and natural, and fastens upon the diseased—the result of a Northern temperament not naturally warm, acted upon by a strained and factitious imagination. So we hear of the beauties of amalgamation, of the warm tropical blood and the sensuous imagination of the dark-skinned and heated races as necessary to give warmth and coloring to the pale-faced and thin blooded races.

So Mr. Story is not satisfied with the old Greek type, with the pure outlines of delicate Caucasian form, but he throws all his skill and genius into a Nubian girl, emblem of the torrid Africa.

So, also, he writes that rich and powerful poem you published last week—but what is it? Ought one to unveil what lies beneath that charm of words, that syren song of genius?

The loves of Antony and Cleopatra, hitherto, by Shakspeare and the world, were thought to be as sensual as poetry or art could adopt or recognize. These loves are thrown aside as too tame, and what is substituted you must read the poem to find out.

ANECDOTES OF COOLNESS AND COURAGE.

Messrs. Editors:

The Dublin University Magazine, in an interesting article on "courage and cowardice," has an anecdote of Lord Howe, the first half of which reminds me of an anecdote of General William Walker, the celebrated filibuster (our William Walker); and the second of an incident which occurred between the late gallant and veteran General E. P. Gaines and myself.

One night (says the narrator) when Lord Howe was in command of the Channel Fleet, he was suddenly awakened by an officer who, in great trepidation, told him the ship was on fire near the powder room; the Admiral coolly replied: "If it is so, sir, we shall very soon know it."

The anecdote of Lord Howe continues:

"Some minutes afterwards the Lieutenant returned and told his lordship he had no occasion to be afraid, for the fire was extinguished. 'Afraid,' replied Lord Howe, hastily, 'what do you mean by that, sir? I never was afraid in my life.'"

At the memorable seige of Rivas, when General Walker was hemmed in by three armies, each numbering many times more than his own little handful, his headquarters were in a solidly built adobe house, consisting mainly of one long room that had been used for a public office—the windows grated and (according to the fashion of the country) without glass. One day in the very extremity of the seige, he was standing in the midst of the room, and as his secretary was in the act of handing him a paper, a ball whistled through the window, passed directly between them and lodged in the opposite wall. The secretary instantly threw himself back; but the imperturbable Walker coolly inquired: "Why did you shrink, sir, the ball was gone before you knew it was coming?"

This anecdote is undoubtedly true. When in Rivas a few months afterward, I heard it from many different persons, native and foreign, and among the rest from an intelligent French officer who had served in the Costa Rica Crusade of the beseiging army. It was also current among the fillibusters themselves, who had escaped from the seige, of whom I met many at Punta Arenas, and at San Jose, the capital of Costa Rica.

In the winter of 1845-6, when the United States and Great Britain were at swords points on the "Oregon Question," General Gaines, in command of the Southwestern Division, had his headquarters at the St. Charles Hotel in New Orleans, where I also at that time resided, and was in daily social intercourse with him. One evening when some particularly exciting news had been received I made the unlucky inquiry: "General, do you apprehend a war with England?" The preux chevalier paused a moment and then turned to me with the air that might be supposed in a Bayard: "Mr. —— is apprehend exactly the word to use to a soldier? I think we shall have a war with England, but I do not apprehend it."

I must, in this connection, pay a passing tribute to the admirable character of the illustrious friend of my early manhood. General Gaines was the most simple-hearted and guileless man I ever knew. His ability, as well as his gallantry and high spirit as a soldier, and in all the relations of life to which he was called, are mottoes of history. What I wish to say of him is, that if he was "without fear" it was literally because he was "without reproach."

A Ferocious Assault on Captain Jaggers.

MR. EDITOR: I have hitherto allowed the fulminations of your correspondent "Captain Jaggers" to pass unnoticed, but there is a time when forbearance ceases to he a virtue; that time hns come. Wheu Jaggers—I decline to call him "Captain Jaggers" until I form the acquaintance of some person who has been favored with a view of his commission—when this Jaggers wrote n communication which nppeared in the "Lion's Mouth" of your issue of Novemher 24th, I determined to wait the issue, and in the event of matters turning out as I knew, yes sir, as I knew they would, to brand Jaggers. This Jaggers in the issue aforesaid stated thnt a certain lawyer in this city had secured a passage to the Sandwich Islands in the Vanderbilt from the Captain of that vessel, hy represeuting himself as a sick young man who wished to travel for the benefit of his health, and who was not nverse to filling the easy position of Captain's clerk. The object of the lawyer was to transact business in connection with the failure of a certain firm ia Honolulu for a certaiu bnnking firm in this city, in advance of the arrival of the attorney of another firm also a large creditor of the firm which had failed. This was true: the eminent, talented aud strategetic young lawyer accomplished bis end and checkmated his adversary. Jaggers makes a further statement: He says that on the above meutioned lawyer's arrival in Honoluln he gave up his sitaation as Captain's clerk, and proceeded at once to fulfill his duties as attorney and couusellor at law. Here again Jnggers is correct. But Jaggers goes still further: He states that the Admiral, enraged at the trick which had heen practised on him, ordered the Captain to addrcss a note to "his clerk," recalling him to his dutics. The unscrupulous Jaggers closes his precious communication thus:

"How our Americnn Pericles replied to this communication, and whether he obeyed the summons, or took the risk of incurring the penalties of desertion, remains to he ascertained. My own opinion, however, is, that he is by this time on his way to Valparaiso, and that his San Francisco clieuts need not expect to see him again for six months or a year to come."

Now, sir, when I state of my own knowledge that the nforesaid emineat lawyer is at present in this city, the falsity of many of the statements and much of the speculation of Jaggers will become evident to yon. I have thus made a brief and necessarily imperfect revision of Jaggers' communicaton, whicb appeared in THE CALIFORIAN of Nov. 24th. It only remains for me to give my opiuion as to the motives which actuated Jaggers in penning that communication. Perhaps you do not know Jaggers. I do. Let him be avoided. The infamous Jaggers is a tall man with a lenn and hnngry look, who wears shoes. His hat is always too well brushed; his coat fits him as tightly as does the skiu of a snake to its body; his nnder lip protrudes slightly; his nose has a small pimple on the left side; he shaves all the hair off his face and hns no eyebrows; when talking on business of any kind he wears spectacles. As an evidence of his dispositiou heing utterly meau aud reprehensible I will mention the fact that he pointed out a small pet terrier, weight 6¼ pounds, for slaughter, to a murderous policemau. The reason of his enmity for the gifted lawyer above mentioned, is this: The gifted lawyer is an experienced political engineer. It was the gifted lawyer, who, hy nrranging for a satisfactory swapping of votes during the last municipal electioa, secured the defeat of Martin J. Burke and brought about the election of Pat Crowley—by a similar move he elected the present city attorney. Such a man must have enemies. Genius always has. I am proud to say he has many enemics. Enemies of more consequence thau the despicable Jaggers. To waste more than a few words on Juggers would he absurd. The eminent lawyer is not in Valparaiso, but in this city, and more's the pity, so is Jaggers. HOOKEY WALKER.

A Very Quiet Joke.

It is evident that the proprietors of the Alta have subjugated Fitz Smythe, and forced him to curb his exuberant wit. The following, which appeared in Thursday's issue of the Alta, proves this coaclusively:

"GAMBOLIERS.—Officers McCormick and Hess arrested Wm. N. Briggs and John Browu for dealing faro at a place on Montgomery street, the first on two charges, and the last on one. The complainant was a gentleman named Bowers from Missouri."

Fitz Smythe imparts a little humor to this item of news hy heading it "Gamboliers," but is forced, in consequence of the cruel restraint imposed upon him, to refrain from recouating it in the excruciatingly funny manner in which he was wont to impart to the public iatelligence of thefts, burglaries, arsons, murders, and other crimes. He has, however, smuggled in a joke which has escaped the vigilant eye of the editors and proprietors of the Alta, and we fear that it may possibly have been passed unnoticed by many readers of the Alta. The joke is contaiaed in the following seutence: "The complniuant was a gentleman named Bowers from Missouri." Fitz Smythe would, if he had dared, have made an exquisitely humorous allusion to "Joe Bowers" who had a brother Ike and came from Old Missouri, all the way from Pike, but he dared not. He would have speculated as to whether or not Wm. N. Briggs was known among the "sporting fraternity" hy the name of "Poker Bill," and would have quoted copiously from the poem in which the troubles which "Poker Bill" (whose other name might possibly have been Willinm N. Briggs) caused the originnl "gentleman named Bowers from Missouri." We sympathize with Fitz Smythe, and as nn assurance of our sympnthy give the above to the public as what Fitz would have said had he not been cruelly restrained.

First-Class Criticism.

San Francisco, we fear, is not sufficiently grateful for the hoon lately granted it. The Times is a newspaper perfect in every department. From the man who does the heavy editorial down to the local items, nll are perfect masters of their art. A musical and dramatic critic has, like the Japunese Jugglers at the Opera House, been engnged "at an enormous expense," and he speaks thus of Lady Don: "She is a fine representation of the classic school of actiug."

The parody of the "Rat Catcher's Daughter," in the opinion of the critic of the Times, belongs to tho "classic school." Singing chambermaid busiaess is the classic style of acting. Lady Don may have received insults from ignorant writers hefore, but she was never so infamously insulted before she came to San Francisco. However, she can, when the critic of the Times calls her "a classic actress," comfort herself as the drunken snilor did when the jackass brayed at him with the reflection that "he knew no better and he didn't mean any harm by it." For fear, however, that other dramatic critics may be misled by the young man who "does up the theatrical items for the Times," we must meution the fact that no actress can be "a representation;" and further, that hurlesque actresses do not claim to belong to the classic school of acting. This sort of thing may be good enough for a young adventurous paper like the Times, hut for papers which have attnined a reputation it would not do at all.

Mrs. Woxeackle on the Press and the Church.

MR. EDDYTER:—On Thanksgiving there was a Union servis in the Caythedral, in wich all the Episkerpal congregashuns partysipatid, tho' why it should be called n Union servis, now that the wnr is over and the Union saved, is unheknown to me, or why politiks should be hrort into the church at all equally so, wicb I have ever set my face against. The sermon was, I am sure, as elokwent as enny precched ou that day in San Francisco, yet the papers wich printed Mr. Stebhings's aud Mr. Scudder's, and Dr. Woodsworth's, and those of other dissenters, hardly so much as even allooded to the discourse of our Rektor, wich how to accouut for I know not, unless all the eddyters belong to the sekts and not to the church. I was mortifide and astonished, I confess, when I come to look at the Alta and Bulletin to find Prishyteerins, and Baptists, and Unitaryius (wich our paster considers no hetter than infidels) and snch, put before the Church, or rather the Caythedral, in both the grate principil commershull papers of the citty, to see Mr. Stebbings's sermon come first a collum and a half long, and then Mr. Woodswuth's another collum, and then all the rest of the sektary's, even to the Jews and the Romunists, and at the bottum of all, three insigniferkant lines sayin' a Union servis of all the Episkerpil churches was held at Grace Caythedril; it was well attendid, and the exercises were exceedingly interesting! When I expressed to Mrs. Van Slamm the disgust with wicb I was inspyerd by such slites upon the church, she only laffed in her breezy way, and sez she, "Well Maria, I suspect the church is like n ship at sea, it seems a grate deal bigger institooshun to them thnt's in it than to the outsiders." Such was her words, wich, for one, I am free to say I cannot see the sense or meaning of.

Yours respectfnl, MARIA WOXCACKLE.

P. S.—Mrs. Van Slamm, who always gits the earlyist noos of every think, wich is no wonder, seeing that she spends most of her time in going arouad hearing what peeple say, and telling it to other peeple, has jest dropped in and told me that Mr. Eagan has come out of the firy furniss like Shadrock and what's his name, ont of the den of lyings. He hns got his papers from Philadelfy, with a compleet carakter, and the Bishop has had to hack down; and he is to have a splendid church (tho' free) on Post street, and all the fashun of Grnce and Trinity nre going there, and it is to be the most aristokratic congregashun in the city; all of wich is inscrootabel to me. For how a free church, where there is nothink to pay, can he fashernahel is too much for my poor hed; and if so, all the mony that we have spent in tour hundred dollar pews, and subscripshuns, and cetery, in order to git into sosyity, is as good as wastid. Local Literature.

California has not as yet added many volumes to the literature of the United States; she has produced, or developed, three or four poets and five thousnnd rhymesters, but the literature of the Stnte has yet to be formed. This being the case it is with pleasure that we notice the occasional gleams of genius which illumine the pnges of the daily press. We have hopes that more than one who is at present in the chrysalis coudition of local items will in time develope into the glorious shape of poet or novelist. Fitz Smythe may, after continuing in the aforesaid grub condition for years, at length become the humorist of America. The local of the Call has great descriptive powers. His account of the dedicatory services at the unveiling of the monument erected by Broderick Engine Company No. 1, in the hurial ground of the late Volunteer Fire Department is thrilling. He tells us that certain resolutioas were read and then continues:

"After the reading, and while the band breathed a softened and delicious harmony, the statue was unveiled by Chief Scannell and Mr. Michael McLaughlin. An involuntary murmur of admiration was heard from the spectators as its fair proportions came into view. It is a figure of a female in an attitude of profound grief, and realizes the old mythologic idea (if we may he pardoned for using it in this Christian age) of Niobe, who, in sorrow for the loss of her children, wept herself to stone. Elaborately chiselled out of pure Italian marble, the figure reflects credit upon the head that designed and the hand that executed it, and will be a conspicuous ornament to that portion of the cemetery."

We have seldom read n parargraph of the saine length as the above which contained so many beauties. "The band breathed a softened and delicious harmony," is a pretty expression, hut the description of the statue is positively sublime. The delicacy manifested by the local in apologizing for his allusion to Niobe—who was not a Christian—in this Christian age, cannot he sufficiently commended. It is just this sort of thing which makes heathens of people. Because a man is well read in the classics he is not therefore excusable when he drags in allusions to heathens: he should not fail to apologize for mentioning such people in this Christian age. There are many such gems as this in the local columns of our daily press, and it is to our essentially local literature that we must look for bright thoughts, brilliant descriptions and flashes of wit, for do we not find them in the works of Fitz Smythe and the local of the Call?

The "Wonder of the Century."

The "Wonder of the Century" is not, it seems, the Atlantic Cable, nor the Aviator, nor the six-legged calf, nor Commodore Nutt, nor the Big Trees of Calaverns, but Master Louis Schmidt. Of this astounding fact we are assured upon high classic authority. The programme of the "Lincoln School Exhibition"—and a very pleasant exhibition it was—emanating, as we are at liberty to presume, from the learned principal of the Institution and his able coadjutors, contains the following:

"To-morrow evening the Exhibition will close with an entirely new and very interesting programme. Willis' Band will be present, and aid in furnishing music. Master Louis Schmidt (the wonder of the nineteenth century) has kindly volunteered his services to assist us, and he will entertain the audience during a portion of the evening with his violin."

And thus we have at length, after much travail, the "ninth wonder of the world," in the persoa of the accomplished Master Louis Schmidt.

Spiritualism.

The Flag and the Golden Era are the only two papers published in this city which ever say a good word for Spiritualism. The Flag, after devoting nearly half a column of its valuable space to an account of the raps which were heard at Mrs. Ada Hoyt Foye's seance on Thursday night at Eureka Hall, says:

"Altogether, the eveuing was a season of great interest, instruction, and rational amusement to all there, and if Mrs. Foye could have the justice and attention which she deserves of the public press, and which are so readily given to all public performers, other than spiritualists, her hall would he crowded every night. Perhaps the local newspapers will become a little more liberal and adventurous, nfter a while, and not afraid to refer to subjects which in other countries have been a theme of discussion some twenty years, and the subject of investigation by many of the strongest minds of the nation."

Generally speaking, public performers, whether conjurors, learned pigs, or three-legged calves, receive notices of their performnnces from those papers only in which said performances are advertised. If Spiritualism is a new religion, it must be expected that it will meet with the opposition which all religions have had to encouuter before they succeeded in gaining many adherents. The Rev. Mr. Crisis received very little encouragement from the press, and, more than this, was actnally fined for preaching what he considered the truth to the public, in the open streets, without charge. The Flag laments that—

"The pleasure of the occasion was somewhat marred by the clatter of a bowliug alley in the basement of the building."

This might interfere slightly with the accuracy of the sounds given in response to questions. A ten strike down stairs was liable to be mistaken for a great manifestation of spirits up stairs, and spirits could scarcely be expected to carry on a conversation very comfortably when they could, in consequence of the material ten-pin halls down stairs, with difficulty hear themselves rap. Mrs. Ada Hoyt Foye should have calculated on the great risk the spirits ran of being bowled out before she chose a hall over a bowling saloon.

High-toned Journalism.

The Marysville Appeal has the following paragraph, which we think might appropriately find a place amoag the curiosities of journalism:

"A day or two ago a friend of the Appeal stepped iato a fruit store on D street, not far from Fourth, and enquired for the morning's Appeal. 'I don't take it,' says the apple vender, 'but here is the Union.' 'Don't take it, don't take it,' respouded our indignant friend, and turning ou his heel and looking back as he made his exit, he pertinently remarked 'perhaps you go to Sacramento to sell your apples.'"

So it would seem that no one is to be permitted to "sell apples" in Marysville—and we presume the principle would also extend to peanuts—unless he subscribes for the Appeal. This idea might advantageously he adopted by our metropolitan journals. We recommeud it to the serious consideration of the Alta and Bulletin. If they can enforce the principle that no one has a right to sell any commodity in San Francisco unless he is a subscriber to their papers, they will greatly extend their circulation.

Sewerage.

"Linn C. Doyle," the San Francisco correspondent of the Stockton Herald, is telling the country people the most terrible stories about San Francisco. He thinks that we are being poisoned hy our Board of Supervisors. Hear him:

"These sewers send out their vapor at every street corner. This vapor is made from the debris of the slaughter houses, the vegetable markets, the filth from hotels, the drunken brothels, the feces of the sick rooms of hospitals und dissecting tables, mire from the streets, breweries, tanneries, and refineries, the vaults nnd the kitchen which empty alike into the sewer. The wharves along the city have beneath their planking ten feet of garbage. It is a sea of fetid slime; the cat, the dog, the ox, the horse, the child, and man float in that gluttonous grave, and send out their sulphuric and carbonic gasses. 'The cloacæ of Rome,' says Leibig, 'absorbed all their well being.' True, the Roman sewers drained the world, nud our sewers are draining our lives. In the circumference of our city you cannot escape it; the graveyard to the West; the slaughter houses South, the night carts North, und the dead sea of every denomination East; filth-seeking Chinese in the Centre; stinking vapor, miasma; everywhere."

If this picture is not overdrawn, the swill-milk sensation must take a back seat.

The Supervisors vs. the Dogs.

There can he no doubt but that the sapient Board of Supervisors will on Monday revoke their infamous ordinance empowering policemen to endanger the lives of the citizens of San Francisco by shooting at little dogs who run about the streets unmuzzled. The Press at large has held up the Board of Supervisors to public reprehensiou and ridicule, and it may be supposed that they are now aware how grossly they have outraged public decency. The most charitable conclusiou at which we can arrive in order to explain the insane action of the Honorable Board of Supervisors of the City aud County of San Francisco is: that one of the honorable members must have been, some time ago, bitten by a mad dog, nud that he has, since that time, bitten the other honorable members composing the Board They have showa that they nro dangerously rabid, and should be each one of them muzzled by Blitz, hefore being allowed to enter the City Hall.

The "Fisherman."

The strikingly original poem entitled "The Fisherman," published in last week's CALIFORNIAN, has given rise to a great deal of comment. The Chronicle hints that the poem is "not originnl," and intimates thnt it has appeared in some "English periodical." The Chronicle is hereby invited to furnish its proofs Glittering generalities, nnd vague suggestions are not nt all satisfactory when literary plagiarism is hinted at. The "Fisherman" is n poem of decided originality—and yet not too original to bo produced in San Francisco.

No Joke.

We are assured (paradoxical as it may appear) thnt little George Gorhnm, former secretary of Gov. Low, and the author of divers pert nnd flippant "open letters" to Eugene Casserly nnd other eminent citizens, is really and seriously a candidate for the position of Governor of Californin. Ridiculous as this seems at the first blush, we are assured upon reliable authority that there is no joke nbout it, and that George is backed by able political managers, and is sanguine of success.

THE journeymen bakers of London held a meeting the other evening to consider how best they might be relieved from the exhausting night work which they now perform. Tho meeting was chiefly remarkable for the speech of a Mr. Wright, a master baker, who strongly counselled the men to strike. "Fancy London without bread for forty-eight hours," said he.

A BUNCH OF QUAYS.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

IN my youth, being very fond of theatrical entertainments, and somewhat restricted in my means of indulging therein, I naturally held in great esteem that magic slips of paper bearing the legend, "Amit two. Boxes. Before seven," which are generously bestowed on the deserving by theatrical managers, by some actors, by a mysterious people in London who never give away anything but orders, but who always have orders to give away; though why they should be the dispensers of dramatic Open Sesames is more than I can for the life of me conceive. For example, there was Pilchard—I have known Pilchard to be without money, without credit, without a dinner, almost without a shirt, but I never knew him to be destitute of a private box. Stay! Once he confessed that he had given away three boxes that afternoon, and must beg me to be content with a couple of stalls. He calls orders "paper." "Do you want any paper?" asks Pilchard. It is his preparatory plea for holding you by the button, and borrowing, eventually, one pound three and sixpence. He never borrowed a sum without fractions in his life. The fractions float the loan, as a sail does a tide. "There's plenty of paper for the Lane going about," says Pilchard, grasping a handful of orders, gleefully. On paper wings this good fellow has skimmed lightly over poverty and insolvency, and that Isle of Dogs to which, without paper to break his fall, he must have gone irretrievably, years ago.

I ran, young, in a theatrical groove; but there were times when I could not procure orders, when I could not get any paper, and I had pocket-money, and paid. Many are the two shillings I have economised for a place in the gallery, to see Mr. Farren and Mrs. Glover in the Love Chase, or Mr. Macready and Miss Helen Faucit in Virginius. There are few boys but would cheerfully give up their dinner or their bed to be able to go to the play. Being poor, I was not, I fear, in those days exempt from the passion of envy. I envied Pilchard, with his perennial private boxes. Pilchard was then my patron, though he occasionally borrowed one pound three and sixpence from my mamma. I envied the ruddy children of the Duke of York's School and the Licensed Victualler's Asylum, who, at Christmas and Easter, were hospitably invited to witness the pantomimes and spectacles gratuitously, and were presented, in addition, with buns and seed-cake. I envied the critics of the newspapers who could walk in and out of every theatre in London, and could insist upon front rows, and be haughty to the boxkeepers without giving them sixpence. How, with cold glazed basilisk eyes those boxkeepers would freeze the hearts of little boys when they came in with orders for two, and brought their grown-up sister with them! There was such a Cerberus, with such eyes, but with a face like that of a petrified codfish, at the old Olympic. He never could find the key to open the door of the box, until I had found my last poor little sixpence, or had borrowed one from my sister. I was always afraid he would say that it was after seven, or that the house was full. Well do I remember his sepulchral "Like a bill, sir?" for latent in his speech I seemed to read, "I call you, sir, because I want your sixpence; but I know you to be a contemptible young cub, and, but for my greed of gain, I would chuck yer down them stairs." A horrible race, ghouls, in short, and vampires. They are always promising to die out, but the bloodsucking boxkeeper does not die.

The Being, however, whom I envied most was the renter. Surely, I thought, he must be the happiest man alive. The renter of Drury Lane or Covent Garden Theater in a golden age, like the poet, was born. So, at least, I thought. Was "paper" scarce, or was it a drug in the market, it mattered nothing to him. He was invulnerable both to the caprices of managers and the exigencies of that season of taboo when the free list was suspended, the public press excepted. He was the privileged one, the dweller on the threshold, the alumnus of the penetralia; the adept, the initiated grand and past master of dramatic illuminati; the fortunate one who could go to the play for nothing whenever he liked.

Are there any renters now-a-days? Is Pilchard alive, or has he retired to his last private box—the box that is made of elm, and covered with cloth, and studded with nails, and screwed down? Is there any "paper" going about beyond Overend and Gurney's, and the debentures of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway? Are there any little boys who yet take their sisters to the play, and tremble before boxkeepers, or who, when they are in funds, pay two shillings to see Ruy Blas or the Dead Heart? I doubt not but there are. "The earth is rich in man and maid," and ever will be, I hope. The old haunts, the old cheap pleasures, exists; but it is we who have fallen away from them, not they that have fallen away from us.

I may say, conscientiously, at this present writing, that I detest theatrical entertainments; that I am never taken to the play but by fierce entreaty, not unmingled with force; that I never sit down in the stalls without reluctance; nor endure the performance without agony; nor leave the horrible mephetic gas choked oven of a place, without delight. I do not know my way through any stage-doors now; a new generation of stage doorkeepers has arisen who know me not. I have not been to a rehearsal, or into a green room, for years, and, save when I am compelled by that same entreaty mingled with force, I never ask any theatrical authorities for orders. Quite divorced from the smell of the lamps, and the sawdust, and the sound of the prompter's whistle, and the slamming of the box doors, and the rustling of ladies' robes as they pass to their seats, all once so pleasant to hear, I still enjoy, to a certain extent, the privilege of going to the play for nothing.

Of one private box I am not only renter, but freeholder. I disdain the favours of the free list. My box belongs to me in free simple. I carry it about with me as Glamdalditch carried Grildrig, I set it down, and opened it, whensoever I list. Now in Europe, now in Africa, now in America. The settlement of the bill of the play depends entirely on my own will and caprice. I may change the performance every night. I may command Mose in Egitto to follow the Miller and his Men, and interpolate the ballet of Giselle between the fourth and fifth acts of Magbeth. I am free to patronise native talent, or to choose my plays and my performers exclusively from foreign sources. Without a farthing of extra expense I will get up a Christmas pantomime or an Easter burlesque. My corps de ballet is ten thousand strong. My "supers" are innumerable. I am not only freeholder of the proscenium box, but stage manager, prompter, and leader of the orchestra. I must own that I am likewise called upon to dress the leading lady, shift the scenes, and snuff the candles. Finally, I am not compelled, when I go to the play for nothing, to assume that most abhorrent of disfigurements, evening dress; on the contrary, when I have a mind to enter my private box, I usually divest myself of all superfluous attire' lie down with my head on a pillow, and on the softest bed attainable, and then ring for the fiddlers to strike up, and for the play to begin. Let me conclude by observing that two of the chief advantages of my theatre personal, are, that I can see the play with my eyes shut, and that my actors and actresses never come to the treasury on Saturday.

Ring up! What shall the play be to-night? I have a lurking liking for fantastic titiles to my dramas. A "Bunch of Quays?" Presto: I have a private box in an inn at Rotterdam. To every stage there must be a proscenium. The frame to my Dutch mirror, is a first-floor window looking out on the great quay of the Boompps. The scenery is very well painted; but the perspective is, perhaps, a little too flat: the light is too evenly diffused to afford any picturesque contrasts of chair'oscuro; and there are, certainly, in the middle distance too many squabby windmills for romantic effect. But you must take your Dutch decorations as you find them. They are all by Vandyke, and not exempt from a slight tinge of mannerism. There are plenty of ships, however, and their infinitely interlaced spars and rigging are very graceful and grateful to the eye. Yonder row of lime-trees, too, on the Boompps are cool and refreshing. Beyond these I do not see much to chronicle in the way of mise en scene, except rain. Bless us, how it has rained for four-and-twenty hours! It never rains but it pours, says the proverb; but it has rained, without pouring, since yesterday morning at Rotterdam. A fine impartial even-spreading rapid sleet; a rain that seems to come up as well as down; a cold vapour-bath.

There is no mud. Dutch cleanliness takes care of that. The stones of my quay cannot be wetter, but they cannot be cleaner. As the rain falls, alert men with birch brooms step forward and sweep it away, ere any particle of earthy matter can enter into solution with the moisture. Such an alert broomster has been at work since early this morning, and I doubt not that he only relieved a guard of other besomists. To paint the lily, or to gild refined gold, has hitherto been deemed a work of supererogation; but what of washing wet flagstones? This, however, is done at Rotterdam. When the man with the broom finds that the rain is getting the better of him, and that, his strennous sweeping notwithstanding, it is slowly forming into puddles into the interstices, he picks his way back to his hotel, and speedily reappears with a pail of water, the contents of which he carefully slushes over the soaking stones. In most continental cities that I have seen, the lazy people wait for the rain to come and wash their streets; and, as it ordinarily comes but once a year in hot climates, the streets are only washed during one month out of the twelve. The Dutch regard the rain as a kind of contaminator, and, with full buckets, hasten to wash it away. A very cleanly people are these Hollanders. They would reach perfection, could they only be persuaded to wash themselves.

Now, on a November morning, to look out on a wet quay, bordered by wet trees, with wet windmills in the middle distance, a wetter sea in the background, and the wettest sky overhead, distilling a persistent moisture, is not very conducive to that state of mental exhilaration which is termed, inelegantly but forcibly, "jolly." Men staying in lonely inns have done desperate things on wet days. Washington Irving's stout gentleman was driven, under the persecution of Aquarius, to salute the chambermaid with a kiss. Ay, and he kissed the landlady to boot. It is my own fault, perhaps, if the first drama I have chosen to witness from my private box is a "water piece." Till the curtain, descends, however, I must fain see the play that I have summoned up; and for the nonce I am at Rotterdam, and on the Boompps, and I cannot help myself. Rain, as a rule, makes one wretched. A Frenchman, who translates the "ennui" from which he really suffers tortures into that fabulous British malady, "le spleen," would very soon ring for a brazier of charcoal and a box of matches, hermetically close all the doors and windows—the which is difficult in this damp and windy country—and, without further ado, asphyxiate himself.

The view of the wet Boompps fails, somehow, to engulf me in despondency. I like the man with the birch broom, and I wonder how many stuyvers he gets a day for washing the rain away. I fancy him a kind of Lowy Country Ixion, condemned to this labor for punitive reasons. I have read old stories of vagrants in the Dutch Rasp-houses sentenced to hard labor in a room where there was a pump, and into which water was continually flowing. If they did not pump it out, they were drowned. I like the little Dutch boys who come splashing along, with their bright violet stockings and their clumping wooden shoes. I admire the fubsy Dutch damsels who pass in their multiplied yet abbreviated linsey-woolsey skirts, and the thin plates of gold over their banded hair, and neatly twilled caps, and demure gorgets, and massy earrings. Surely these Dutch damsels cannot never want sweethearts, for I calculate that, on a reasonable average, every young woman has at least seven pounds ten worth of good substantial finery about her. I like the Dutch young woman; though the censorious may urge that her gait more intimately resembles a waddle than a walk.

A traveler, even the most splenetic, has no right to suffer from the spleen when he can see ships. Now, on the Boompps this wet morning, there are any number of ships. I will dismiss the great flat-bottomed barges, heaped high from stem to stern with cabbages, with onions, or with the cannon balls of peace—Dutch cheeses. I will eliminate from my picture, the lumbering tuylschuyts—omnibuses of the water, which look like the lord mayor's barge grown out of all shape, or the Bucentaur become dropsical. Of schooners and brigantines, sails and ferry-boats, clinging to the Boompps like burrs to the hand which is drawn through a hedge, I will say nothing. But I cannot spare you that great, deep-hulled, swelling-sided three-master, the Waterstaat East Indiaman, which is ever now loading for Batavia, and is to set sail tomorrow morning, they tell me, for her spicy destination.

I love a ship. My heart leaps up, quite as high as Mr. Wordsworth's when he beheld the rainbow in the sky, when I think that yonder great black mass pitched all over—the ark which contains Shem, Ham, Japhet, and their wives and families, and casks of beef and pork, and preserved peas, and Bass's pale ale, and a hold full of Manchester cotton goods, prisoned by hydraulic pressure with shining iron bands, and pigs, and sheep, and poultry, and all manner of creeping things—shall, with no stronger assistance than that afforded by a few poles and some tarred strings and some wet towels, but with a trusty man at the helm, and a master mariner who knows his navigator by heart, be wafted over the world—be spirited from those dull misty Boompps to the huge hot Javan region—to the land of infinite spices and continual coffee groves, and where the very air is sticky with sugar.

How inadequate seems even the biggest ship to contain a tithe even of the things which you know to be stowed away in her! Row round her, pace her deck from stem to stern, view her near or from afar off, and still you can with difficulty persuade yourself that so much cargo, and so many stores, and so many living souls, can be in reality packed within her sides. It is all very well, when she is a steamer, to be told that she gets lighter every day, owing to the quantity of coals she has burnt; but how did she get all those coals into her bunkers, to begin with? It is very well to explain to me the theory of winds and tides, and the mathematical laws of navigation; but her sails and her masts, her captain and her crew, her charts and her compasses, and her quadrants notwithstanding, she is not the less to me a mystery of mysteries. However she does get, anyhow, to her destination I know no more than did the wisest man that ever lived. King Solomon was fain to confess that, next to the way of a fowl in the air and a serpent on a rod, the way of a ship on the sea puzzled him most crucially.

Now, this enormous Waterstaat East Indiaman. She looks as firmly planted at her moorings as the Stadt House at Amsterdam on her piles: yet to-morrow morning, when I take a survey of the Boompps from my windows, I shall find the Waterstaat clean gone—gone, like the puff of smoke belched forth by a cannon in a holiday salute. And she will reach the shores of Java somehow, this unwieldy monster, and, all unwieldy as she is, the waves will make sport of her, and dandle her like an infant, or send her spinning like a top, or see-saw, like Margery Daw, and turn her all but upside down. For my part I decline, in the present mood of my mind, to believe in the winds and tides, and the laws of navigation. I prefer to believe in Neptune with an attendant bevy of Tritons—hairy persons of a salt savor, blowing lustily into enormous conch-shells. I prefer to believe in Æolus—have I not heard him playing upon a harp, purchased at Cramer's, set outside my chamber window? I prefer to believe that Boreas is indeed a blustering railer. I prefer to believe in the corporeal existence of those sirens of the sea against whom the heathen man whom Homer sang of, stopped his ears. I see the sirens. They belong to the corps de ballet. They have long back hair, which they let down over their white shoulders. Goodness gracious me! What a change has come over the stage of my theatre! The Waterstaat East Indiaman, the Boompps, the muddy river, all fade away. I behold an ocean of painted canvas, and behind some blue gauze waves are a bevy of sirens, with their long back hair floating over their white shoulders; and there, as I live, is pretty and fresh Miss Julia Smith with a branch of "property coral" in her hand, singing "Over the dark blue waters, over the wide, wide sea." How many years have gone down under the dark blue waters and put out to the wide, wide sea, since I went to the play for nothing, and saw Oberon at the St James' theatre in London! —All the Year Round.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

THE LABORER'S DEAD.

BY GEORGE COOPER.

SCENE—A Coffin Wareroom.

"A child'e I think you wanted; well,
How small a one, my man?"
"The smallest here; and please to sell
As cheap, good sexton, as you can;

"We're very poor—our little one
This morning from us passed"—
The father spoke in trembling tone,
And blinding teare fell fast—

"Her little face seems everywhere—
I've seen it all day long;
And all day long upon the air
I've heard her laugh and song."

The winter etreets, in warning light,
With storm and tramp were loud;
But they saw no eadder sight
In all that hurrying crowd,

Than a weary laborer, worn and pale,
Who plodded to his humble meal,
And sheltered from the sleety gale
A tiny coffin made of deal!

Mr. A. T. STEWART, the famous New York dry goods merchant and millionaire, is sixty-nine years old, and enjoys better health now than he has done for the past twenty-five years. He attends daily to his business, but does not work so assiduously as he once did, and he attributes his present good health to his partial relaxation. He is now, as he always was, a man of very regular and steady habits, and partakes of but two meals a day—a light breakfast, and a good dinner, early in the evening, at his home on Fifth Avenue. He is now devoting considerable attention to his laudable design of erecting buildings for the poor, in which, he will expend about five millions of dollars.

POSING A PEDAGOGUE.—"Sally Jones, have you done that sum I set you?" "No, thir; I can't do it." "Can't do it? I'm ashamed of you. Why, at your age I could do any sum that was set me. I hate that word 'cant,' for there is no sum that can't be done, I tell you." "I think, thir, I know a thum you can't thifer out." "Ha! well, Sally, let's hear it." "It ith thith, thir: If one apple cauthed the ruin of the whole human rath, how many thuch will it take to make a barrel of thider, thir?" "Miss Sally Jones, you may return to your parsing lesson." "Yeth, thir."

POST OFFICE clerks occasionally get off a funny thing, at least so says the Binghamton Daily Republican. A clerk in our Post Office heard a tap at the window of the ladies' department, when who should he find there but a man by the name of Drake, to whom he said: "Mr. Drake, will you please go to the other side? this department is for ducks!"

A SPREAD-EAGLE orator of New York State wanted the wings of a bird to fly to every town and country, to every village and hamlet in the broad land; but he wilted when a naughty boy in the crowd sang out: "Dry up, you old fool: you'd be shot for a goose before you flew a mile."

A FAST STORY.

AN ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman; "they have to commence ringing about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound: the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-grown head of hair and teeth in their mouths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', also, Mechanical Toys, that run by themselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"Indeed! is that so? Who is the firm that have the Dolls saying 'Mamma'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasing? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

BE TRUE.

Thou must be true thyself,
If thou the truth wouldst teach:
Thy soul must overflow, if thou
Another's soul wouldst reach;
It needs the overflow of heart
To give the lips full speech.

Think truly, and thy thoughts
Shall the world's famine feed:
Speak truly, and each word of thine
Shall be a fruitful need;
Live truly, and thy life shall be
A great, and noble creed.

H. Bonar, D. D.

The Eye of an Eagle.—The eyes of all birds have a peculiarity of structure which enables them to see near or distant objects equally well, and this wonderful power is carried to the greatest perfection in the bird of prey. When we recollect that an eagle will ascend more than a mile in perpendicular height, and from that enormous elevation will perceive its unsuspecting prey, and bounce on it with unerring certainty; and when we see the same bird scrutinizing, with almost microscopic nicety, an object close at hand, we shall at once perceive that he possesses a power of accommodating his sight to distance in a manner to which our eye is unfitted, and of which it is totally incapable. If we take a printed page, we shall find that there is some particular distance, probably ten inches, at which we can read the words and see each letter with distinctness; but if we move this page to a distance of forty inches, or bring it within a distance of five inches, we shall find it impossible to read it at all; a scientific man would, therefore, call ten inches the focus or focal distance of our eyes. We cannot alter this focus except by the aid of spectacles.

But an eagle has the power of altering the focus of his eye just as he pleases; he has only to look at an object at the distance of two feet or two miles in order to see with perfect distinctness. Of course the eagle knows nothing of the wonderful contrivance which God has supplied for his accommodation; he employs it instinctively and because he cannot help it. The ball of the eye is surrounded by fifteen little plates, called sclerotic bones; they form a complete ring, and their edges slightly overlap each other. When he looks at a distant object this little circle of bones expands, and the ball of the eye being relieved from the pressure becomes flatter; and when he looks at a very near object the little bones press together, and that ball of the eye is squeezed into a rounder or more convex form; the effect is very familiar to everybody; a person with a very round eye is near-sighted, and only sees clearly an object that is close to him; and a person with flat eyes, as in old age, can see nothing clearly except at a distance; the eagle, by mere will, can make his eyes round or flat, and see with equal clearness at any distance.

At Mulhausen an exhibition of animal taming on a small scale was being gone through, recently. The tamer tried his hand on a wolf and a hyena, which obeyed with wonderful docility; but a panther contested matters with him, and, after a short struggle, flung the man down and bit at his neck, rendering him insensible. At this part of the proceedings it seemed only a question of eating the man, when the directress dashed a bucket of water on the panther, at which he retired disgusted.

"Put Down That Pickle!"—The words are uttered hurriedly and harshly by the sergeant, to an ungracious private, who, carried away by his hungry passions, had snatched a pickle from the barrel. "And why should I put down the pickle?" queries the private, mildly. "Put down that pickle!—that's all I want of you," returned the sergeant, determinedly. "Down it goes then!" he cried, and stuffing it into his mouth it quickly disappeared.

A Man who had won a turkey at a raffle, and whose pious wife was very inquisitive about the method of obtaining the poultry, satisfied her scruples, at last, by the remark that the "Shakers" gave it to him.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND
IN USE
THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING
Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,
FOR WOOD OR COAL.
IMPROVED IN 1861;
WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.
2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.
3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.
4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.
5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.
6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.
7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.
9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.
10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

☞ Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.
See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

STOP THAT COUGHING.
SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. but
PULMONARY SYRUP
is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of
NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,
and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that
Newell's Pulmonary Syrup
has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.
Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

REDINGTON & CO.'S
Essence of Jamaica Ginger.
THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.
As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.
It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.
It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.
It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

THE SOUTH.

O, land of the princely palmetto tree,
My heart must sorrow to think of thee.

For here by my side is a vacant chair,
And a soldier's hurried grave is there.

For the boy I loved, the brother I bore
In my arms in youth is mine no more.

He sleeps by a river whose gilding breath
Will sing forever and ever of death.

He went—and his cheek and dark brown curls
Were rich and beautiful as a girl's.

He went—where the blaze and the battle smoke
From the long blue lines in volleys broke.

He went—ah! deep was our every prayer,
But he tarries forever and ever there.

O, land of the palm, I will love you still,
For the boy who tarries and ever will.

For the boy who died in the lines of blue,
For the love he bore the North and you.

O, land of the south! O, land of the dead!
Be soft as a pillow to his dear head!

SACREDNESS OF TEARS.—There is a sacredness in tears. They are not a mark of weakness, but of power. They speak more eloquently than a thousand tongues. They are the messengers of overwhelming grief, of deep contrition, of unspeakable love. If there were wanting any argument to prove that man is not mortal, I would look for it in the strong, convulsive emotions of the breast, when the soul has been deeply agitated, when the fountains of feeling are arising, and when the tears are gushing forth in crystal streams. Oh, speak not harshly to the stricken one weeping in silence. Break not the deep solemnity by rude laughter or intrusive footsteps. Despise not woman's tears—they are what make her an angel. Scoff not if the stearn heart of manhood is sometimes melted to tears—they are what help to elevate him above the brute.

THE Soleil publishes the following anecdote concerning the Emperor of Austria while out shooting: "His majesty is always attended by a captain of the guard; whose duty it is to observe the effects of each shot and announce it. The emperor, for instance, strikes a partridge. 'Partridge!' cries the captain. Next time it is a buck. 'Buck!' shouts the captain. One day the emperor fired, misses his game, and wounded one of his suit. The latter, on being struck, uttered an exclamation. 'His highness the Duke of Hackenburg!' announced the captain, without the slightest change of feature or tone."

AMONG the Seneca Indians, when a maiden dies, they imprison a young bird until it first begins to try its powers of song, and then, loading it with kisses and caresses, they loose its bonds over the grave, in the belief that it will not fold its wings nor close its eyes until it has flown to the spirit land, and delivered its precious burden of affection to the loved and the lost.

SUPERLATIVES are dangerous things. A man once wrote to his wife, "My dearest Maria:" and by return of post he received the cold reply: "Premit me to correct either your grammar or your morality. Pray, who are your other dear Marias?"

FOUR men who shingled a house at North Spencer, Mass., 48 years ago, reshingled it for the first time last week. The youngest is 65 years old, and the oldest 72. Two of them are graudfathers, and the other two ancient and confirmed bachelors.

HUMBUG.—"Now, papa, tell me what is humbug." "It is," replied papa, "when mamma pretends to be very fond of me, and puts no buttons on my shirts."

A GREAT many men make a virtue of necessity, but extremely few a necessity of virtue.

THE greatest gluttons are those who feed upon slander.

AYER'S

CHERRY PECTORAL,

FOR THE RAPID CURE OF

COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA, HOARSENESS, CROUP, BRONCHITIS, INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION, AND FOR THE RELIEF OF CONSUMPTIVE PATIENTS IN ADVANCED STAGES OF THE DISEASE.

SO wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous are the cases of its cures, that almost every section of country abounds in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other Expectorant is too apparent to escape observation and where its virtues are [illegible], the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs that are incident to our climate. While many inferior remedies thrust upon the community have failed and been discarded, this having gained friends by every trial, conferred benefits on the afflicted they can never forget, and produced cures too numerous and too remarkable to be forgotten.

We can only assure the public, that its quality is carefully kept up to the best it ever has been, and that it may be relied on to do for their relief all that it has ever done.

Great numbers of clergymen, Physicians, Statesmen, and eminent personages, have lent their names to certify the unparalleled usefulness of our remedies, but space here will not permit the insertion of them. The Agents below named furnish gratis our AMERICAN ALMANAC in which they are given; with also full descriptions of the complaints they cure.

Those who require an alterative medicine to purify the blood will find AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA the remedy to use. Try it once, and you will know its value

AN HOUR IN A LIFE-TIME.

THE CHAPEL.

IN every life are hours with memories fraught,
So interlinked and with our being wrought
That all the creeping years from youth to age,
Dim not the record, though they stain the page.
To each there comes the crisis and the hour,
That shapes futurity with fateful power—
Imparts their coloring to the years to be,
Dyes with its hues the web of Destiny—
Making hearts hopeless in life's cheating dream,
Or buoyant as the birds at morning's gleam.

I see again the mist from silvery rills
That flecks and falls o'er distant green-browed hills;
A quiet valley, elms that droop and sway
With every faintest breath by night or day;
A rustic chapel hid in bowery seas,
And a gray spire that overtops the trees
By the old grave-yard, with its slabs that gleam
So ghastly white in the moon's pallid beam.
On such a night as this, long years ago
A youth and maid that ivied porch passed through.
One chime from out the belfry swelled and died
As by the chancel they stood side by side,
And spake the solemn words that sure and fast
United them while life's swift dream should last.
The solemn words are said, the rite is done,
That makes the twain irrevocably one;
But why this parting at the chapel door,
Of those whom Time and Fate should part no more—
Till that dread parting which must come at last,
But ne'er should come till love's brief dream has passed?
The moonbeams gild the sea; at anchor rides
A bark whose prow the silvery flood divides,
And a frail shallop waits in yonder bay
To bear the bridegroom of an hour away—
Who, in the ocean's strange weird solitude,
Fitful thoughts not uncongenial to his mood,
And gazing upward to the cloud-flecked sky,
Murmurs with pride and triumph in his eye.
Though strange and sad, our parting shall be brief,
And joy shall dawn upon the night of grief!
Not long O, sweetest love, hast thou to wait,
E'er I shall claim thee at thy guardian's gate!

L. MENDENHALL.

[For the Californian.]

THE SCULPTOR.

A SCULPTOR modeled a maiden in clay,
Like none on earth he had seen,
But as something fair from an unknown past,
It came like a vision between.

And it seemed to have a life of its own,
This form that was modeled in clay,
A semblance of one he might have known,
In a world that was far away.

And his soul was rapt in ecstatic love,
Strange melodies filled the air,
As the statue grew up beneath his hand,
It seemed so passingly fair.

Then he draped it o'er with a velvet pall,
And trembled in troubled fear,
Lest this vision of love from a better world,
Forever should disappear.

But earth is brittle and time is strong,
And the form that held his trust,
Unveiled one day from its velvet pall,
Had fallen to shapeless dust.

And thus all are sculptors that work in clay,
And the things we hold most dear
Are memories only of better worlds,
That never are lasting here.

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES.

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, an only son and spendthrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and forty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amherst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post-mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London. In London, at the house of Stewart Routh, a gentlemanly gambler and adventurer of good accomplishments and address, the reader is introduced to his wife Harriet, commonly addressed by Routh as "Harry,"—a woman of rare mental qualifications and quick appreciation, thoroughly devoted to her husband, his counselor in all his schemes, and a most efficient aid in his precarious mode of living.

One Deane, an American, a cool, sharp, "posted" man, with abundant means, is also introduced, whose cleverness is even too much for the designs of Routh and his wife. George Dallas receives a letter from his mother, who writes him that the one hundred and forty pounds, obtained by a great risk and almost criminal sacrifice, will be given to him by her in person at Amherst. He informs Routh of the import of his mother's letter. Routh, meanwhile, is organizing a company for working some newly discovered silver mines in Brazil, which promises to be "a big thing," but is badly in want of funds to successfully launch his scheme; when he learns from Deane that he is to receive for some stock transaction three thousand pounds, which sum Deane proposes to keep in his desk for a few days until wanted; and, in celebration of the event, he invites Routh and Dallas to dine with him at a fashionable restaurant on the same evening. Routh tells his wife that he must have Deane's money "one way or another." The dinner comes off, but Routh is not present.

George Dallas again visits Amherst under his author-name of "Paul Ward," to receive from his mother the money she promised him; when he learns from her lips that she has secretly sent her diamonds to Paris to be imitated, with the object of pledging the genuine ones as the only available means of obtaining the amount. The jewelry failing to arrive, his mother requests him to stop at Amherst for a few days to await its arrival. While sketching a private park, "The Sycamores," a chance acquaintance is brought about—which rapidly ripens into mutual though unavowed feelings of affection between Miss Clare Carruthers, a beautiful young lady of nineteen, the favorite niece and heir of the rich Capel Carruthers—Dallas' father-in-law—and our hero; known only to Miss Carruthers as "Paul Ward," the author. After receiving the bracelet from his mother, George Dallas returns to London, arriving late in the evening. He but called at the Mercury office, where he overhears some conversation about a recent murder, and immediately goes to visit Routh; not finding him in he shows Harriet the bracelet, proposing to dispose of it the next morning, and pay his indebtedness to Routh. Harriet suggests that he may compromise his mother by the sale of the bracelet in London; and advises him to extract the jewels and take a run over to Amsterdam where he may dispose of them to the diamond merchants there without fear of that risk. After extracting the diamonds the bracelet and some turquoise stones it contained, were placed in a sealed envelope endorsed by Dallas' signature, and deposited in a drawer in Routh's desk. Harriet, feverish with anxiety for Dallas' departure, advances him a small sum of money to pay the expenses the trip, at the same time dexterously changing Routh's overcoat for his own. Dallas departs with the intention of sailing at 7 o'clock next morning in the Argus for Rotterdam. Harriet, terribly agitated, now ties Dallas' coat compactly around a heavy square of black marble, taken from a writing table—and concealing the bundle under her shawl, issues from the house at early dawn, and cast it into the Thames. She purchases a similar marble letter weight to replace the one thus used, and returns to the house. Routh returns and Harriet declares she "has saved him!"

BOOK II.

CHAPTER I.—AT POYNINGS.

LIFE at Poynings had its parallel in hundreds of country-houses, of which it was but a type. It was a life essentially English in its character, in its staid respectability, in its dull decorum. It is the day-dream of many an English country gentleman that his house should, in the first place, be respectable, in the second place, comfortable, in the third place, free from damp; after these successes are achieved, he takes no further thought for it; within and without the dullness may be soul-harrowing; that is no affair of his. So long as his dining-room is large enough to contain the four-and-twenty guests who, on selected moonlight nights, are four times in every year bidden to share his hospitality—so long as the important seignorial dignities derivable from the possession of lodge, and stable, and kennel are maintained—so long as the state devolving upon him as justice of the peace, with a scarcely defined hope of one arriving at the position of deputy lieutenant, is kept up, vaulting ambition keeps itself within bounds, and the young English country gentleman is satisfied.

More than satisfied, indeed, was Mr. Capel Carruthers in the belief that all the requirements above named were properly fulfilled. In his earlier life he had been haunted by a dim conviction that he was rather an ass than otherwise; he remembered that that had been the verdict returned at Rugby, and his reflections on his very short career at Cambridge gave him no reason to doubt the decision of his schoolfellows. Not a pleasant source of reflection even to a man of Mr. Carruthers' blunted feelings; in fact, a depressing, wrong, Radical state of mind, for which there was only one antidote—the thought that he was Mr. Carruthers of Poynings, a certain settled stable position which would have floated its possessor over any amount of imbecility.

Carruthers of Poynings! All the old armor in the hall, hauberks and breastplates, now propped upon a slight wooden frame, instead of enclosing the big chests and thews and sinews which they had preserved through the contests of the rival Roses or the Cavaliers and Roundheads—all the old ancestors hanging round the dining-room, soldiers, courtiers, Kentish yeomen, staring with grave eyes at the smug white-whiskered old gentleman, their descendant—all the old tapestry worked by Maud Carruthers, whose husband was killed in the service of Mary Stuart—all the carvings and gildings about the house, all the stained glass in the windows, all the arms and quartering and crests upon the family plate—all whispered to the present representative of the family that he was Carruthers of Poynings, and as such had only to make a very small effort to find life no very difficult matter, even for a person scantily endowed with brains. He tried it accordingly—tried it when a young man, had pursued the course ever since, and found it successful. Any latent suspicion of his own want of wisdom had vanished long since, as how, indeed, could it last?

When Mr. Carruthers took his seat as chairman of the magisterial bench at Amherst, he found himself listening with great admiration to the prefatory remarks which he addressed to the delinquent in custody before passing sentence on him, unconscious that those remarks only echoed the magistrate's clerk, who stood close behind him whispering into his ear. When, as was his regular custom, he walked round the barn, where, on rent days, the tenants were assembled at dinner, and heard his health proposed in glowing terms, and drunk with great enthusiasm—for he was a good and liberal landlord—and when he addressed a few conventional words of thanks in reply, and stroked his white whiskers, and bowed, amidst renewed cheering, how should a thought of his own short-comings ever dawn upon him?

His short-comings! the short-comings of Mr. Carruthers of Poinings? If, indeed, in his earlier days there had been a latent belief in the existence of anything so undesirable and so averse to the proper status of a county magnate, it had long since died out. It would have been hard and unnatural, indeed, for a man so universally respected and looked up to, not to give into the general creed, and admit that there were undoubted grounds for the wide-spread respect which he enjoyed.

A man of his stamp generally shows to the least advantage in his domestic relations. Worshiped from a distance by outsiders, there is usually a good deal too much Grand Lama-like mystery and dignity about the recipient of all this homage to render him agreeable to those with whom he is brought into daily contact. Mr. Carruthers was not an exception to the rule. He was thoroughly impressed with the idea that "woman is the lesser man," and he felt that any open display of affection on his part towards his wife might militate against what he considered entirely essential to his domestic happiness, his "being looked up to." He was in the habit of treating his wife in ordinary matters of social intercourse very much as he treated the newly-appointed justice of the peace at the meetings of the magisterial bench, viz., as a person whose position was now recognised by the laws of society as equal to their own, but who must, nevertheless, feel inwardly that between him and Mr. Carruthers of Poynings there was really a great gulf fixed, the bridging of which, however easy it may appear, was really a matter of impossibility.

If these feelings existed, as they undoubtedly did in Mr. Carruthers under the actual circumstances of his marriage, it may be imagined that they would have been much keener, much more intensified, had he taken to wife, instead of the quiet widow lady whom, to the astonishment of the county, he chose, any of the dashing girls who had danced, dressed, and flirted at him perseveringly, but in vain. Poynings was a sufficiently nice place to render its master a catch in the county, and to induce husband-hunting misses to discount his age and pomposity, so that when the cards of Mr. and Mrs. Capel Carruthers were sent round (it was before the cotemptuous days of "no cards"), and it was discovered that the new mistress of Poynings was somebody quite out of "the set," immediately "that dear Mr. Carruthers" became "that horrid old thing," and it required years of open-handed hospitality to re-establish him in favor.

But Capel Carruthers has chosen wisely, and he knew it. With all his weakness and vanity, a gentleman in thought and tastes, he had taken for his wife a lady whose birth and breeding must have been acknowledged in any society; a lady whose age was not ill-suited to his own, whose character was unimpeachable, who was thoroughly qualified to superintend the bringing out of his niece, and whose sole vulnerable point for criticism—her poverty—was rendered invulnerable as soon as she became Mrs. Carruthers of Poynings. And, under all the cold placid exterior which never thawed, under all the set Grandisonian forms of speech which were never relaxed, flowed a warm current of love for his wife which he himself scarcely suspected. With such poor brains as he had occasionally fallen to the task of self-examination, asking himself how it was that he, Mr. Carruthers of Poinings (even in his thoughts he liked the ring of that phrase), could have so far permitted himself to be swayed by any one, and then he told himself that he was reverenced and looked up to, that his state, position, and dignities were duly acknowledged, and in a satisfied frame of mind he closed the self-colloquy.

Loved his wife—eh! neither he nor any one else knew how much. George Dallas need not have been anxious about the treatment of his mother by his stepfather. When the young man cursed his exile from his mother's presence and his step-father's home, he little knew the actual motives which prompted Mr. Carruthers to decide upon and to keep rigidly in force that decree of banishment. Not only his step-son's wildness and extravagance; though a purist, Mr. Carruthers was sufficient man of the world to know that in most cases there are errors of youth which correct themselves in the flight of time. Not a lurking fear that his niece, thrown in this prodigal's way, should be dazzled by the glare of his specious gifts, and singe her youth and innocence in their baleful light. Not a dread of having to notice and recognise the young man as his connexion in the chastened arena of county society.

As nature had not endowed Mr. Carruthers with a capacity for winning affection, though it was not to be denied that these qualities in his character which commanded respect, it was fortunate for him that he cared less about the former than the latter. Nevertheless, he would probably have been rendered very uncomfortable, not to say unhappy, had he supposed that his wife, "Mrs. Carruthers of Poynings," as there is reason to suppose he designated her, positively did not love him. Such a supposition, however, never had occurred to him. The notion itself would have been, in the first place, untrue, and in the second, dangerous. Mrs. Carruthers of Poyniugs loved her rather grim and decidedly uninteresting but unimpeachably respectable husband, if not passionately, which was hardly to be expected, very sincerely, and estimated him alter the fashion of wives—that is to say, considerably above his deserts.

All women like their husbands, except those who notoriously do not, and Mrs. Carruthers was no exception to the rule. She had a much greater sense of justice in her than most women, and she used it practically—applied it to her own case. She knew the fault had been her son's in the great sorrow which had destroyed all the pride and pleasure which her prosperous marriage would otherwise have brought her, and she did not charge it upon her husband, or, except in so far as her unconquerable anxiety and depression caused him annoyance, did she inflict the penalty of it on him. She knew him to be a hard man, and she did not look for softness from him. So she accepted the great trial of her life, and suffered it as quietly and patiently as she could.

It would be difficult to define with precision the nature of Mr. Carruthers' sentiments towards George Dallas. The young man had met his step-father but rarely, and had on each occasion increased the disfavor with which from the first the elder man had regarded him. He had never tried to propitiate, had, indeed, regarded him with contemptuous indifference, secure in what he fancied to be the security of his mother's position; and there had been covert antagonism between them from the first. How much astonished Mr. Carruthers would have been had any revelation been made to him of the secrets of his own heart, whereby he would have discovered that a strong sentiment of jealousy lay at the root of his antipathy to George Dallas—jealousy which intensified his hardness and sternness, and forbade him to listen to the promptings of common sense, which told him that the line he was taking towards the son was so cruel to the mother as to neutralise all the advantages presented by the fine marriage she had made, and for which, by the way, he expected her to be constantly demonstratively grateful. In this expectation he was as constantly disappointed.

Mrs. Carruthers was an eminently true woman, and as she felt no peculiar exuberance of gratitude, she showed none. She was a lady, too—much more perfectly a lady than Mr. Carruthers was unimpeachably a gentleman—and, as such, she filled her position as a matter of course, as she would have filled one much higher, or one much lower, and thought nothing about it. She was of so much finer a texture, so much higher a nature than her husband, that she did not suspect him of any double motive in his treatment of George Dallas. She never dreamed that Mr. Carruthers of Poynings was secretly uneasily jealous of the man who had died in his prime many years before, and the son, who had been first the young widow's sole consolation and then her bitterest trial. She had never, in their most confidential moments, remarked on any likeness between George and his father; and never, indeed, mentioned Captain Dallas at all, which appeared extremely significant to Mr. Carruthers, but, seeing that Captain Dallas had been dead twelve years when his widow became Mrs. Carruthers of Poynings, would not have occasioned much surprise to the world in general. Mr. Carruthers regarded himself as his wife's benefactor, but she did not partake of his views in that respect. The notion which he entertained of his position with regard to his niece Clare was better founded and more reasonable.

The beautiful young heiress, who was an unconscious and involuntary element in the standing grievance of Mrs. Carruthers' life, was the only child of Mr. Carruthers' brother, and the sole inheritor of his property. Her father had died while she was a little child, and her mother's method of educating her has been already described. She was attached to her uncle, but was afraid of him; and she was happier and more at ease at the Sycamores than at Poyuings. Of course Mr. Carruthers did not suspect his niece of any such depravity of taste. It never occurred to him that any one could fancy himself or herself happier anywhere on the face of the created globe than at Poyuings; and so Clare escaped the condemnation which she would otherwise have received in no stinted measure.

Accustomed to attach a wonderful amount of importance to duties and responsibilities which were his, if their due fulfillment could add to his dignity and reputation, Mr. Carruthers was a model of the uncle and guardian. He really liked Clare very much indeed, and he was fully persuaded that he loved her. He spoke of her as "my brother's heiress," and so thought of her, not as "my brother's orphan child;" but in all external and material respects Mr. Carruthers of Poynings was an admirable guardian, and a highly respectable specimen of the uncle tribe. He would have been deeply shocked had he discovered that any young lady in the county was better dressed, better mounted, more obsequiously waited upon, more accomplished, or regarded by society as in any way more favored by fortune than Miss Carruthers—not of Poynings, indeed, but the next thing to it, and likely at some future day to enjoy that distinction. Mr. Carruthers did not regret that he was childless; he had never cared for children, and, though not a keenly observant person, he had noticed occasionally that the importance of a rich man's heir was apt, in this irrepressibly anticipative world, to outweigh the importance of the rich man himself. No Carruthers on record had ever had a large family, and, for his own part, he liked the idea of a female heir to the joint property of himself and his brother, who should carry her own name in addition to her husband's. He was determined on that. Unless Clare married a nobleman, her husband should take the name of Carruthers. Carruthers of Poynings must not die out of the land. The strange jealousy which was one of the underlying constituents of Mr. Carruthers' character came into play with regard to his niece and his wife. Mrs. Carruthers loved the girl, and would gladly have acted the part of a mother to her; and as Clare's own mother had been a remarkably mild specimen of maternal duty and affection, she could have replaced that lady considerably to Clare's advantage. But she had soon perceived that this was not to be; her husband's fidgety sense of his own importance, his ever present fear lest it should be trenched upon or in any way slighted, interfered with her good intentions. She knew the uselessness of opposing the foible, though she did not understand its source, and she relinquished the projects she had formed.

Mr. Carruthers was incapable of believing that his wife never once dreamed of resenting to Clare the exclusion of George, for which the girl's residence at Poynings has been assigned as a reason, or that she would have despised herself if such an idea had presented itself to her mind, as she probably must have despised him had she known how natural and inevitable he supposed it to be on her part.

Thus it came to pass that the three persons who lived together at Poynings had but little real intimacy or confidence between them. Clare was very happy; she had her own tastes and pursuits, and ample means of gratifying them. Her mother's brother and his wife, Sir Thomas and Lady Boldero, with her cousin, their ugly but clever and charming daughter, were much attached to her, and she to them, and, when she got away from Poynings to the Sycamores, Clare acknowledged to herself that she enjoyed the change very much, but was very happy at Poynings nevertheless. The Sycamores had another interest for her now, another association, and the girl's life had entered upon a new phase. Innocent, inexperienced, and romantic as she was, inclined to hero-worship, and by no means likely to form sound opinions as to her heroes.

Clare Carruthers was endowed with an unusual allowance of common sense and perception. She understood Mr. Carruthers of Poynings thoroughly; so much more thoroughly than his wife, that she had found out the jealousy which permeated his character, and recognised it in action with unfailing accuracy. She had considerably more tact than girls at her age ordinarily possess, and she continued to fill a somewhat difficult position with satisfaction not only to others, but to herself. She contrived to avoid wounding her uncle's susceptible self-love, and to keep within the limits which Mrs. Carruthers' discretion had set to their intimacy, without throwing external coldness or restraint into their relations.

Clare found herself very often doing or not doing, saying or refraining from saying, some particular thing, in order to avoid "getting Mrs. Carruthers into a scrape," and of course she was aware that the constantly-recurring necessity for such carefulness argued, at the least, a difficult temper to deal with in the head of the household; but she did not let the matter trouble her much. She would think, when she thought about it at all, with the irrepressible self-complacency of youth, how careful she would be not to marry an ill-tempered man, or, at all events, she would make up her mind to marry a man so devotedly attached to her that his temper would not be of the slightest consequence, as, of course, she should never suffer from it.

On the whole, it would be difficult to find a more dangerous condition of circumstances than that in which Clare Carruthers was placed when her romantic meeting with Paul Ward took place—a meeting in which the fates seemed to have combined every element of present attraction and future danger. Practically, Clare was quite alone; she placed implicit confidence in no one, she had no guide for her feelings or actions, and she had just drifted into a position in which she needed careful direction. She had refrained from mentioning her meeting with the stranger, more on Mrs. Carruthers' account than on her own, from the usual motive—apprehensive lest, by some unreasonable turn of Mr. Carruthers' temper, she might be brought "into a scrape." Her curiosity had been strongly excited by the discovery that Mrs. Carruthers had some sort of acquaintance with Paul Ward, or, at least, with his name; but she adhered to her resolution, and kept silence for the present.

Mrs. Carruthers' son had always been an object of tacit interest to Clare. She had not been fully informed of the circumstances of her uncle's marriage, and she understood vaguely that George Dallas was an individual held in disfavor by the august master of Poynings; so her natural delicacy of feeling conquered her curiosity, and she abstained from mentioning George to his mother or to Mr. Carruthers, and also from giving encouragement to the gossip on the subject which occasionally arose in her presence.

In Mrs. Carruthers' dressing-room a portrait hung, which Clare had been told by Mrs. Brookes was that of her mistress' son, when a fine, brave, promising boy ten years old. Clare had felt an interest in the picture, not only for Mrs. Carruthers' sake, but because she liked the face which it portrayed—the clear bright brown eyes, the long curling hair, the brilliant dark complexion, the bold, frank, gleeful expression. Once or twice she had said a few words in praise of the picture, and once she had ventured to ask Mrs. Carruthers if her son still resembled it. The mother had answered her, with a sigh, that he was greatly changed, and no one would now recognise the picture as a likeness of him.

The dignified and decorous household at Poynings pursued its luxurious way with less apparent disunion among its principal members than is generally to be seen under the most favorable circumstances, but with little real community of feeling or of interest. Mrs. Carruthers was a popular person in society, and Clare was liked as much as she was admired. As for Mr. Carruthers, he was Mr. Carruthers of Poynings, and that fact sufficed for the neighborhood almost as completely as it satisfied himself.

The unexpected return of her uncle from York had caused Clare no particular emotion. She was standing at the French window of the breakfast-room, feeding a colony of birds, her out-door pensioners, when the carriage made its appearance. She had just observed the fact, and was quietly pursuing her occupation, when Mrs. Carruthers, who had left the breakfast-room half an hour before, returned, looking so pale, and with so unmistakable an expression of terror in her face, that Clare looked at her in astonishment.

"Your uncle has come back," she said. "I am not well, I cannot meet him yet. Go to the door, Clare, and tell him I am not well, and am still in my room. Pray go, my dear; don't delay a moment."

"Certainly I will go," answered Clare, leaving the window and crossing the room as she spoke; "but——"

"I'll tell you what ails me another time, but go now—go," said Mrs. Carruthers; and, without another word, the girl obeyed her. She had seen the carriage at a turn in the avenue; now the wheels were grinding the gravel of the sweep opposite the hall door. In a minute Clare was receiving her uncle on the steps, and Mrs. Carruthers, having thrown the bonnet and shawl she had just taken out for her proposed expedition to the shrubbery back into the wardrobe, removed her gown, and replaced it by a dressing-gown, was awaiting her husband's approach with a beating heart and an aching head. Had he met her son? Had he passed him unseen upon the road? Would Mrs. Brookes succeed, unseen and unsuspected, in executing the commission with which she had hurriedly charged her?

"She is in a scrape of some sort," Clare thought, as she accompanied her uncle to his wife's dressing-room. "What can have happened since he left home? Can it have anything to do with Paul Ward?"

CHAPTER II.

IN CONFERENCE.

It is nine o'clock in the morning, and breakfast is on the table in the pretty breakfast-room at Poynings.

Mrs. Carruthers is bodily ill and mentally depressed. A racking nervous headache has deprived her of sleep during the past night, and has left its traces in deep lived marks underneath her eyes. She has a worn-out look and a preoccupied manner, and while she is superintending the preparation of the Grand Lama's tea—a process about which he is particular, and which is by no means to be lightly undertaken—her thoughts are far away, and her mind is full of doubts and misgiving. Why did her husband come back so suddenly from the agricultural meeting yesterday? Could he by any means have been aware of George's presence in the neighborhood; and, if so, had he hastened his return with the view of detecting him? If so, he had providentially been thwarted in his plan. Nurse Ellen had seen the boy, and had conveyed to him the bracelet; the means of release from his surrounding difficulties were now in his hands, and the mother felt sure, from his manner, that he would keep his word, and never again subject himself to such a fearful risk. All danger surely must be over; no hint had been dropped by her husband of the slightest suspicion, and yet Mrs. Carruthers watches every change of his countenance, listens nervously to every footfall on the stairs, hears with a heart-beat the creak of every opening door, and is, obviously, constrained and wretched and ill at ease.

Clare notices this pityingly and with wonder; Mr. Carruthers notices it too, with wonder, but without any pity, but he resents it, in point of fact, silently and with dignity. That Mrs. Carruthers of Poynings should "mope" and be "out of sorts" is a kind of reflection on Mr. Carruthers of Poynings, which that gentleman by no means approves of. Over the top of his rustling newspaper he looks at his wife with severe glances levelled from under knitted brows; between his occasional bites of toast he gives a short, sharp, irritable cough; now and then he drums with his fingers on the table, or taps his foot impatiently on the floor. No notice of these vagaries is taken by either of the ladies, it being generally understood at Poynings that the Grand Lama will always find vent in speech when the proper time arrives. Meanwhile, Mrs. Carruthers moodily broods over the breakfast equipage, while Clare is occupied in arranging some flowers.

The Grand Lama becomes more and more irate, glares through his gold double eye-glasses at the newspaper, wherein he is reading atrociously "levelling" views promulgated by a correspondent, gives utterance to smothered sounds indicative of indignation and contempt, and is just about to burst forth in a torrent of rage, when the door opens, and a footman, entering, hands a card on a salver to his master. As when, in full pursuit of the flying matador, the bull in the arena wheels round and engages the lithe picador who has just planted a flag-bearing dart in his quivering carcase, so Mr. Carruthers turns upon the servant who had interposed between him and the intended objects of his attack.

"What's this?" said he, in a sharp voice.

"Card, sir," said the footman, utterly unmoved, and with the complacent expression of an ancient gurgoyle on a Saxon church.

"Do you think I'm blind?" said his master. "I see it's a card. Where did it come from?"

"Gentleman in the library, sir. Said you was at breakfast; told me no 'urry, and giv' me his card."

Mr. Carruthers looks up suspiciously at Thomas, footman, but Thomas, footman, is still gurgoylesque. Then Mr. Carruthers replaces his eye-glasses, and, looking at the card, reads theron, in old English characters, "Mr. Dalrymple," and in pencil the words "Home Office." "I will be with the gentleman in a moment." Only stopping at the looking-glass to run his fingers through his hair and to settle the tie of his checked cravat, Mr. Carruthers creaks out of the room.

Mr. Dalrymple, of the Home Office, has established himself in a comfortable chair, from which he rises on Mr. Carruthers' entrance. He is a tall, bald-headed man, and, to Mr. Carruthers' horror, wears a full-flowing brown beard. The Grand Lama, whose ideas on this point are out of date, knows that beards are now generally worn by members of the aristocracy as well as foreigners and billiard-sharpers, but cannot conceive that any government has been so preposterously lax as to permit its officials to indulge in such nonsense. Consequently he refers to the card again, and, his first impressions being verified, is dumb with astonishment. Nevertheless, he controls his feelings sufficiently to bow and to point to a chair.

"I am an early visitor, Mr. Carruthers," says Mr. Dalrymple, "but the fact is, my business is pressing. I came down to Amherst by the mail-train last night, but I would not disturb you at so late an hour, and, moreover, I could have done no good by seeing you then; so I slept at the inn. My visit to you is on business, as I presume you understand?"

Mr. Dalrymple says this pointedly, as the Grand Lama's face is rapidly assuming an open mouth and sunken jaw expression of idiocy. He recovers himself by an effort, and, glancing at the card, mutters "Home Office."

"Precisely," says Mr. Dalrymple. "I am principal clerk in the Home Office, and I come to you in your capacity as justice of the peace. Lord Wolstenholme, our Secretary, noticed that you generally acted as chairman of the bench of magistrates, and therefore decided that you were the proper person to be communicated with."

Mr. Carruthers' attention, which has been wandering a little—his eyes are still attracted by his visitor's beard, and he is wondering how long it has been growing, and why it should be, as it is, of two distinct shades of brown—is recalled by these words, and he mutters that he is obliged to his lordship for his opinion.

"Now, my dear Mr. Carruthers," says Mr. Dalrymple, bending forward in his chair, dropping his voice to a whisper, and looking slyly from under his bushy eyebrows, "will you allow me to ask you a question? Can you keep a secret?"

Mr. Carruthers is taken aback. From his magisterial and county-gentleman position he looks upon secrets as things exclusively appertaining to the vulgar, as connected with conspiracies, plots, swindles, and other indictable offences. Considering, however, that the matter is brought under his notice in connection with the Home Office, he thinks he may venture to answer in the affirmative, and does accordingly.

"Ex-actly," says Mr. Dalrymple. "I knew your answer before I put the question; but in these little matters it is absolutely necessary to have perfect accuracy. Now then to the point—we are quite out of earshot. Thank you! No chance of any one listening at the doors?"

Mr. Carruthers says "No," with an expression of face which says he should very much like to catch any one there.

"Pre-cisely! Now, my dear Mr. Carruthers, I will at once put you in possession of Lord Wolstenholme's views. The fact is, that a murder has been committed, under rather peculiar circumstances, and his lordship wants your assistance in investigating the matter."

Messrs. Hurd & Houghton, of New York, the proprietors of the "Riverside Press," announce for publication a Magazine for Children, to be called The Riverside Magazine for Young Folks. It will contain interesting original articles and choice and appropriate illustrations.

An excited gentleman at a fire headed a line of fire buckets, and as fast as they were passed to him he threw bucket and all into the fire, crying out all the while—"Pass on more buckets!"

Good actions once resolved, like fixed stars, should hold one and the same station in firmness, and should not be subject to irregular and retrograde motions.

AN INCIDENT AT SADOWA.

THE canon were belching their last
O'er the fields where the routed were flying,
And shouting pursuers strode fast
Through the heaps of the dead and the dying.

War's rage was beginning to wane;
The fierce cared no longer to strike;
And the good stopped to soften the pain
Of victors and vanquished alike.

A yellow-haired Austrian lad
Lay at length on a shot-furrowed bank;
He was comely and daintily clad
In the glittering dress of his rank.

Not so white, though, his coat as his cheek,
Nor so red the sash crossing his chest
As the horrible crimson streak
Of the blood that had welled from his breast.

His foes approached where he was laid,
To bear him in reach of their skill;
But he murmured, "Give others your aid;
By our Fatherland! let me die still."

At dawn they came searching again,
To winnow the quick from the dead;
The boy was set free from his pain,
And his faithful young spirit had fled.

As they lifted his limbs from the ground,
To hide them away out of sight,
Lo! under his bosom they found
The flag he had borne through the fight.

He had folded the silk he loved well,
Lest a shred should be seen at his side:
To wave it in triumph he fell;
To save it from capture he died.

The head of the sternest was bared
As they gazed on the shot-riven rag,
And the hand of the hardiest spared
To make prey of that Austrian flag.

O'er the tomb of their brother they bowed,
With a prayer for a spirit as brave;
And they gave him a flag for a shroud
In his narrow and nameless grave.

THE TEA PLANT.

TEA and coffee, without which Europe got along for five thousand years, have become necessaries of life. They are not food, and, therefore, not essential; they give neither fat, flesh, nor bone, but are simply stimulants, though, from their action on bile, tea may be beneficial. Its popularity with woman is probably due to this.

Considering the different sources from which tea and coffee come, it is a curious fact that they both acquire their stimulating power from a principle named theine, common to both plants, and of which no other plant is known to possess any marked quantity.

There is a genus of plants of the tribe camellieæ. The seed sown, soon after it ripens, in holes four or five inches deep and three or four inches apart. The plants rise in a cluster when the rain comes on, and require little care but weeding. The leaves are fit to gather the third year. A plant is considered good for seven or ten years, when it is cut down and young shoots allowed to rise. It blossoms along the branch, having almost blossom for leaf, and thus giving it quite a rich appearance. The gathering of the leaves is an important matter. They are taken off with great care, one by one.

Three crops are taken, in March, May, and August, the exact period varying according to the climate of the districts. When the leaves are gathered, they are dried in a small furnace, each furnished with a small iron pan, on which the leaves, after a preliminary drying in the sun, are thrown out and stirred. When dried they are cooled and rolled on a table, and then sorted.

The best kinds are put up very choicely, while the poorer kinds are made into masses like bricks. Of these the Abbe Huc gives an amusing description in his "Travels Through Tartary," where they are chiefly sent.

There have been many discussions as to the green and black teas, but the prevailing opinion is, that the difference does not arise from their being taken from different plants, but from the season in which they are plucked, and especially from the manner in which they are prepared.

Balzac, Frederic Soulie, Eugene Sue, Roger Beauvoir, Chauxdesaignes, Leon Gozlan, are among the French authors whose position was earned by an excessive exercise of imagination and of mental industry generally. Of them and of similar workers in France men say lightly, "Well, they live by it!" Jules Janin, in adverting to the nature of the deaths of the above writers, in a notice on Leon Gozlan, replies, "Yes, and they die of it!"

The newest Yankee notion is an umbrella with a gutter round the edge and a spout at one corner.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

EDWARD POLLOCK, the most richly endowed in native genius, and the strongest of pinion, though among the poorest in culture, of our California poets, used to insist that death is a subject that does not legitimately admit of poetical treatment. "There is no way," he argued "in which death can be rendered poetical, except by disguising what is real and literal about it. It is too humiliating and too appalling to admit of being treated at the same time artistically and truly." Nevertheless, a great number of poets of no ordinary genius have essayed the theme. Mrs. Akers, better known by her pseudonym "Florence Percy," is the author of the following:

THE MOUNTAINS.

"Sitting alone in this silent room,
Blinded with weeping, and sick and strange,
I see it, whitening out of the gloom,
A chill and sorrowful mountain range.

"Never o'er summit, or sweep, or slope,
A gleam of gladness or pleasure thrills,
Never a glimmer of joy or hope
Blesses or brightens these desolate hills.

"All the winds which over them blow,
Are sighs too bitter to brook control,
And all the freshening rains they know
Are not tears wrung from a stricken soul.

"First is a pallid, smileless face,
Turned for ever away from tears,
Then two pale hands which will keep their place,
Folded from labor through all the years.

"Then the knees which will never bow,
Never bend or obey again;
And then the motionless feet which now
Are done with walking in sun and rain.

"These are the mountains, and over all
Sinks and settles the winding sheet,
Following sharply each rise and fall
From the pallid face to the quiet feet.

"These are the mountains which through the gloom
Rising whitely and cold I see,
Sloping into the shadowy tomb,
The mournful hills of mortality."

Tennyson, in his "Deserted House," has essayed the same subject, and has treated it more poetically—and less repulsively, because avoiding the minutiæ of the ghastly theme:

THE DESERTED HOUSE.

Life and Thought have gone away
Side by side,
Leaving doors and windows wide;
Careless tenants they!

All within is dark as night:
In the windows is no light;
And no murmur at the door,
So frequent on its hinge before.

Close the door, the shutters close,
Or thro' the windows we shall see
The nakedness and vacancy
Of the dark deserted house.

Come away: no more of mirth
Is here, or merry-making sound.
The house was builded of the earth,
And shall fall again to ground.

Come away; for Life and Thought
Here no longer dwell;
But in a city glorious
A great and distant city—have bought
A mansion incorruptible,
Would they could have stayed with us!

The following poem of Mrs. Akers' most strongly reminds one of Tennyson, as the readers of the "Princess" will readily acknowledge:

TEMPT ME NO MORE.

"Tempt me no more, thy tones are sweet and deep;
Yet they fall vainly on my weary ears;
Pass on and leave me here to dream and weep,
Counting the footfalls of the lonesome years;
Tempt me no more!

"My wreath of life holds no fresh bloom for thee—
Its flowers are strewn on unforgotten graves—
Only its withered leaves remain to me,
And they drift darkly toward death's wintry waves;
Tempt me no more!

"Gather not rose-leaves trampled in the dust;
No kindness can their wasted bloom renew.
Go, let them die unheeded as they must;
Seek thou for blossoms fresh and bright with dew;
Tempt me no more!"

A correspondent requests us to publish one of those "rollicking songs" of Thomas Love Peacock's, to which we alluded week before last as being "among the best of their kind in the language." Our correspondent seems, we infer from his mode of expression, to suspect that we have rather over-estimated the "Forgotten Poet." Here is a specimen of Peacock's convivial lyrics from which the reader may make his own estimate:

THREE TIMES THREE.

"In his last hinn Sir Peter lies,
Who knew not what it was to frown;
Death took him mellow by surprise,
And in his cellar stopped him down.
Through all our land we could not hoast
A knight more gay, more prompt than he,
To rise and fill a bumper toast,
And pass it round with THREE TIMES THREE.

"None better knew the feast to sway,
Or keep Mirth's boat in better trim;
For Nature had but little clay
Like that of which she moulded him.
The meanest guest that graced his board
Was there the freest of the free,
His bumper toast when Peter poured,
And passed it round with THREE TIMES THREE.

"He kept at true good-humor's mark,
The social flow of pleasure's tide;
He never made a brow look dark,
Nor caused a tear, but when he died.
No sorrow round his tomb should dwell;
More pleased his gay old ghost would be,
For funeral song, and passing bell,
To hear no sound but THREE TIMES THREE."

The following is attributed, by some, to Peacock; by others, to Professor Aytom; and by some to "Father Prout," the author of the "Bell of Shandon:

THE DIRGE OF THE DRINKER.

"Brothers, spare awhile your liquor, lay your final tumbler down;
He has dropped—that star of honor—on the field of his renown!
Raise the wail, but raise it softly, lowly bending on your knees,
If you find it more convenient, you may hiccup if you please.
Sons of Pantagruel, gently let your hip-hurraing sink,
Be your manly accents clouded, half with sorrow, half with drink!
Lightly to the sofa pillow lift his head from off the floor;
See, how calm he sleeps, unconscious as the deadest nail in door!
Widely o'er the earth I've wandered; where the drink most freely flowed,
I have ever reeled the foremost, foremost to the beaker strode.
Deep in shady Cider Cellars I have dreamed o'er heavy wet,
By the fountains of Damascus I have quaffed the rich sherbet,
Regal Montepulciano drained beneath its native rock,
On Johannis' sunny mountain frequent hiccuped o'er my hock;
I have bathed in butts of Xeres deeper than did e'er Monsoon,
Sangaree'd with bearded Tartars in the Mountains of the Moon;
In beer-swilling Copenhagen I have drunk your Danesman blind.
I have kept my feet in Jeua, when each bursch to earth declined:
Glass for glass, in fierce Jamaica, I have shared the planter's rum,
Drank with Highland dhuiué-wassails, till each gibbering Gael grew dumb;
But a stouter, bolder drinker—one that loved his liquor more—
Never yet did I encounter than our friend upon the floor!
Yet the best of us are mortal, we to weakness all are heir,
He has fallen, who rarely staggered—let the rest of us beware!
We shall leave him as we found him—lying where his manhood fell,
'Mong the trophies of the revel, for he took his tipple well.
Better 'twere we loosed his neckcloth, laid his throat and bosom bare,
Pulled his Hobies off, and turned his toes to taste the breezy air.
Throw the sofa cover o'er him, dim the flaring of the gas,
Calmly, calmly let him slumber, and, as by the bar we pass,
We shall bid that thoughtful waiter place beside him, near and handy,
Large supplies of soda-water, tumblers bottomed well with brandy,
So, when waking, he shall drain them, with that deathless thirst of his—
Clinging to the hand that smote him, like a good 'un as he is!"

A GREAT MAN CONVERTED INTO APPLES.

The Hartford Press has the following curious article in regard to a recent attempt to exhume the remains of Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island, buried some 180 years ago:

"On scraping off the turf from the surface of the ground the dim outlines of the seven graves, contained within one square rod, revealed the burial ground of Roger Williams. In colonial times, each family had its own burial ground, which was usually near the family residence. Three of these seven graves were those of children, the remaining four those of adults. On digging down into the "charnel-house," it was found that everything had passed into oblivion. The shapes of the coffins could only be traced by a black line of carbonaceous matter, the thickness of the edges of the sides of the coffins, with their ends distinctly defined. In the grave of his wife there was not a trace of anything save a single lock of braided hair, which had survived the lapse of more than 180 years. Near the grave stood a venerable apple tree, when, and by whom planted, is not known. This tree had sent two of its roots into the graves of Mr. and Mrs. Williams. The largest root had pushed its way through the earth till it reached the precise spot occupied by the skull of Roger Williams. There making a turn, as if going round the skull, it followed the direction of the backbone to the hips. Here it divided into two branches, sending one along each leg to the heel, where they turned upward to the toes. One of these roots had a slight crook at the knee, which makes the whole form. There were the graves, emptied of every particle of human dust! Not a trace of anything was left! It is known to chemistry that all the flesh, gelatinous matter giving consistency to the bones, are resolved into corbonic acid gas, water and air, while the solid lime dust usually remains. But in this case even the phosphate of lime of both graves was all gone! There stood the 'guilty apple tree,' as was said at the time, caught in the very act of 'robbing the grave.'

"The organic matter of Roger Williams had been transmitted into the apple tree; it had passed into the wood fibre and was capable of propelling a steam-engine; it had bloomed in the apple blossoms and had become pleasant to the eye; and more, it had gone into the fruit from year to year so that the question might be asked: Who ate Roger Williams?

And this idea of the mutation of the earthly substance of Roger Williams into the fruit of an apple tree, reminds us of one of Holmes' poems—the most truly poetical of all his poems—in fact, the only "poem," in the better sense of the word, that the "Autocrat" has (in our judgment) ever written. It is in the same key as the pieces of Tennyson and Mrs. Akers given above, and finer than either:

UNDER THE VIOLETS.

Her hands are cold; her face is white;
No more her pulses come and go;
Her eyes are shut to life and light;
Fold the white vesture, snow on snow,
And lay her where the violets blow.

But not beneath a graven stone,
To plead for tears with alien eyes;
A slender cross of wood alone
Shall say, that here a maiden lies
In peace beneath the peaceful skies.

And gray old trees of hugest limb
Shall wheel their circling shadows round
To make the scorching sunlight dim
That drinks the greenness from the ground,
And drop their dead leaves on her mound.

When o'er their boughs the squirrels run
And through their leaves the robins call,
And ripening in the autumn sun
The acorns and the chestnuts fall,
Doubt not that she will heed them all.

For her the morning choir shall sing
Its matins from the branches high,
And every minstrel voice of spring
That trills beneath the April sky
Shall greet her with its earliest cry.

When turning round their dial track,
Eastward their lengthening shadows pass,
Her little mourners, clad in black,
The cricket, sliding through the grass,
Shall pipe for her an evening mass.

At last the rootlets of the trees
Shall find the prison where she lies,
And bear the buried dust they seize
In leaves and blossoms to the skies.
So may the soul that warmed it rise!

If any, born of kindlier blood,
Should ask: What maiden sleeps below?
Say only this: A tender bud,
That tried to blossom in the snow,
Lies withered where the violets blow.

The stanza preceding the last, is the one that brought the poem to our mind in association with the article from the Hartford paper in relation to the attempt to exhume the body of Roger Williams. Even the critics who deny that the versatile and talented Boston M. D. is "a poet," will scarcely deny that "Under the Violets" is a genuine poem.

"BRICK POMEROY'S" LAW SUIT.

We see by a late number of the Democrat, that that well-known editor and humorous writer, has been hauled up for shooting two chickens worth fifty cents each. He defended his own case in court, and gives the following account of the

CHICKEN LAW SUIT.

The plaintiff, Reinhardt Hendricks, brought in his bill, swore to its correctness, testified that he owned the chickens, that they were raised by a hen belonging to him, that he saw the defendant shoot them; that he had repeatedly asked the defendant to settle for them; and failing to get pay or satisfaction he was compelled to bring suit, and ask for judgment of one dollar and costs.

The defendant admitted shooting the chickens, and proved by four reliable witnesses the following facts: In April, 1866, the defendant owned a fast running trick mare "Kitty," which animal was kept in a stable hired by him, and cared for by one of his employes. Through a little hole in the barn or stable the plaintiff's hens would fly in and eat oats intended for the mare "Kitty," and on the approach of any one would fly out. In an old barrel in the stable, one of the hens, a black one, made her nest, laid thirteen eggs therein, and proceeded to raise a family. When the hen got ready to set, the defendant instructed the boy who took care of his mare to go down town, purchase thirteen eggs of J. W. Robinson & Co., grocers, and put them in the nest, first removing the other eggs. The boy did so, as was proved. He then personally drove the hen out of the stable a dozen times or more—he tried to make her leave—she would not, but proceeded to incubate his eggs, duly bought and paid for, without his consent, leave or license, after repeated efforts on his part and by his agents to have her vacate his premises. And further, when the hen had hatched his eggs, she ran away with his chickens, eleven in number, two eggs not producing chickens. To her services he brought an offset, the use of stable and board bill in the shape of oats—he charged her with the two eggs she spoiled, and demanded judgment for the balance of the flock, nine in number, at fifty cents each. And, beside, he proved the chickens did not belong to that hen, as she was black, while the chickens were red or speckled! Hendricks has sued all his neighbors for some trifling matter half-a-dozen times each during the past two years. After a patient hearing, the Judge decided that there was no cause for action, and that the defendant was entitled to the other nine chickens, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of the suit, amounting to $17 37½.

Bad News for Unmarried Ladies.—Among the new inventions is a button which is fastened to cloth without thread. It is said to consist solely of a button with a wire to be inserted into the cloth like a cork-screw, and then pressed down flat, so as to form a ring to hold the button to its place. As this invention will enable men to keep the buttons on their shirts, it is calculated to do away with wives altogether.

Boucicault seems to be the theatrical rage. No less than six London theatres are now running his pieces.

TWENTY YEARS AGO.

THEN, life wus in its golden prime,
And we gave ne'er a thought to Time,
Nor dreamed he wore his silv'ry threads
Each vear 'mid locks of loved ones heads;
Or chased from cheeks the roseate hue
Mantling in yours, when I met you
Some twenty years ago!

Ere Hope bad plumed her wing for flight,
Or shadows told of coming night;
When calm, sweet sleep cured each day's woes,
And we knew nought of fears or foes—
Peuce, o'er the lund her blessings sbed,
Stern war, to death no victims led,
Some twenty years ago!

Then, joy's full tide was at its flow,
'Tis ebb now with us, love you know;
And nought of all that wreck is seen,
Suve the undying faith I ween
That we pledged, each, to last thro' life—
My darling little sweetheart—wife!
Some twenty years ago! H. S. B.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE crowded condition of our columns will confine our notices to a mere summary of amusements announced for this week.

AT MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE Lady Don is playing her "last nights." The burlesque of Kenilworth, which proved one of her most popular pieces during her prior engagement, will be revived for to-day's matinee; and will, in conjunction with that sterling nautical drama, Black-Eyed Susan, form the bill for this evening's entertainment. On Monday that grand scenic extravaganza, Lalla Rookh, will be produced with splendid costumes, and gorgeous Eastern scenery by the Tornings. The story of the piece is founded on Moore's celebrated poem of that name, and in incideut and scenery, is full of the glamour of the Orient.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The Japanese Jugglers are a complete success, and are creating a Japanese furore in the amusement world. Their entertainments are in every respect worthy of the support they are receiving, being wonders as well as novelties in the jugglery and gymnastic line. Their feats are unanimously conceeded to far excell those of the famous European gymnasts who have visited our shores during the last ten years. They give a Japanese matinee—let cosmopolitan New York take note of that—this afternoon, and the usual evening performance to-night. On Monday evening some novel and daring feats will be introduced.

MR. AND MRS. JOSEPH HEINE'S second concert, assisted by Miss Emma and Miss Clelia Howson, Miss Short, an ameteur, Mr. Henri Herberte, and Mr. Wunderlich, will take place at Platt's Music Hall on Monday evening next. The programme—published on the last page of our paper—is a very full and choice one, replete with musical gems. Their introductory concert proved Mr. and Mrs. Hein to be artists of culture and ability; and was a musical success. Their second concert should be more than that, it should be a pecuniary one; und draw forth a full Hall of our music-loving population.

M. Heine's performances are peculiarly interesting in consequence of his being deprived of the sense of sight. In his case, as in that of many others, the sense of touch is remarkably developed, and the delicacy with which he "feels" the strings of his instrument, is wonderful. M Heine was a pupil of Sainton, the greatest violinist of the present century, and on his leaving his tutor Sainton confessed that "he could teach him nothing more." Paul Julien was a master of the violin, his forte lay in the brilliunce of his execution, which could be appreciated by musical connoisseurs. The music which Heine produces appeals to the souls of his hearers. To appreciate his playing it is not necessary to know a note of music, and at the same time the most exegeant of musical critics cannot fail to be satisfied. Madame Heine is decidedly the best pianiste who has ever visited these shores, and may be said to be only second to Arabella Goddard, who is acknowledged to be the best pianiste in the world. The young ladies of San Francisco will probably derive as much advantage from hearing M'me Heine perform—Menedelssohn's Grand Rondo in B minor—on Monday as they could from many lessons from a mere "musical instructor."

METROPOLITAN.—Willie Edouin, with his clever little Japanese tricks, learned during a recent residence in Japan, and The Golden Egg, have been the attractions at this house. The first has had its run, though the latter remains still a good egg.

NAST'S PAINTING OF "Sherman's March Through Georgia" has been much visited and admired. It is on exhibition at Snow & Roos' gallery, 219 Montgomery street, and is deservingly attracting public attention. Near four hundred persons visited it in one day during the fore part of the week. The fee is very moderate, being fixed at twenty-five cents only.

ALLITERATION.

COLERIDGE and De Quincey are rich in alliteration. De Quincey uses it with superb effect. In Coleridge's poems it is often the best note in the music. For instance, in the "Aucient Mariner," the repetition in the following stanza heightens the picture of the hapless mariner's ship:

"The *b*reezes *b*lew, the white *f*oam *f*lew,
The *f*urrow *f*ollowed *f*ree,
We were the *f*irst that ever burst
Into that silent sea."

And then again:

"His *b*ones were *b*lack with many a crack,
All *b*lack and *b*are, I ween;
Jet *b*lack and *b*are, save where the rust
Of mouldy damps and charnel crust
They were patched with purple and green."

Once more:

"And the coming wind did roar more loud,
And the *s*ails did *s*igh like *s*edge."

And, again with an indescribably exquisite cadence:

"To Mary, queen, the praise be given,
She *s*ent the gentle *s*leep from heaven,
That *s*lid into my *s*oul."

In fact Coleridge is rich, almost beyond comparison, in euphonious and assonant alliteration. Much of the wild and weird effect of the "Ancient Mariner," and of the mastery of its spell, is due to the subtle interlinking of the sounds of letters. The fascination is intensified by the congregation and commingling of similar vocables, and the coloring is thereby deepened.

"MAUD MULLER."—We have received from A. Roman & Co. a copy of Ticknor & Fields' edition of Maud Muller, with Hennessy's illustrations, one of the most elegant gift-books of the season. Of the twelve illustrations, the second, "Nameless Longings," is the most pleasing, if not the most meritorious, giving admirable expression to the sentiment of the lines:

"But when she glanced to the far-off town,
White from its hill-slope looking down,
The sweet song died, and a vague unrest—
And a nameless longing filled her breast—
A wish, that she hardly dured to own
For something better than she had known."

As a specimen of typography the book can scarcely be surpassed.

WE are indebted to E. F. Arnold, Market street near Montgomery, for the last Galaxy, a New York illustrated magazine.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—Read the following letter:

SAN FRANCISCO, December 10, 1866.

To JOHN ARCHBALD, Esq., Treasurer British Benevolent Society.—Sir: The Directors of the Builders' Insurauce Company donate (enclosed) one hundred dollars to your excellent Society. We ure aware that your object is relief for the distressed of every nation who are amongst us, and we conclude that so laudable an undertaking, impartially carried on, must evoke the hearty support of the affluent corporations which abound in this city. No stranger dropping in amongst us should be suffered to want food. Every religious creed, in all nations and in all ages, has taught that the poor are a charge upon the rich. We Christians are not near so charitable as the followers of Mahomet, for amongst them no one is allowed to go hungry. When the forlorn, penniless stranger drops into San Francisco, where or to whom is he to apply? Your struggling association, and that other excellent institution, the "St. Vincent de Paul Society," are about the only public friends of the unfortunate, and the frequent response from the managers of these to applicants is: "We have no funds on hand," or, "We are in debt to our Treasurer." Now, gentleman, this ought not to be. There should be a bold and earuest application made to the affluent around us—an ample fund established. Let it go abroad that the stranger will find food and sympathy in California, and it will at once serve out worldly interests by drawing people into our vacant lands, while at the same time we are complying with the highest duty of the Christian.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS MOONEY, President.

HOLIDAY PREPARATIONS.—STEVENS, of the late firm of STEVENS & OLIVER, is making grand preparations for the Holidays, and informs his patrons and the public that he is now prepared to furnish Parties and Weddings with everything required in his line. And to supply the increasing demand in the cuisine department, has associated with him Mr. McDonald, the celebrated caterer for the public; formally at the corner of Clay und Leidsdorff streets, whose well known reputation for the serving up of the choicest oysters, clams, and seasonable delicacies, is a most enviable one. This, with the late improvements that MR. STEVENS has made in his establishment, must serve to make it for San Francisco what Taylor's is to New York—the most popular place of its kind. *

WE visited the store of J. W. Tucker & Co., yesterday, and must say that it is one of the most beautiful sights in the city; stocked as it is with its wealth of bright gems and Jewellery, Diamonds, Pearls, Amethysts, Topaz, Emeralds, Rubys, Sapphires, Corals, Watches, Silver ware, etc. For purchasing valuable Holiday Gifts—gems of the earth und sea that fade not nor depreciate in value—there is no place like Tucker's. *

RARE HOLIDAY GOODS may he purchased at A. Gensoul's French book-store, 511 Montgomery street, who has received un invoice of the choicest French fancy goods, albums, illustrated books, French work-boxes, vases, etc. Call and inspect them. *

NO MORE appropriate gift for the Holiday present can be found than a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine. These Machines have lately been greatly improved, and are now considered the very best for Family use. *

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 10.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

SPEAKING of modern medical practice, REIL says: "I have long enough been tossed on the sea of unfounded hypothesis, to feel convinced that absolute darkness prevails in the medical practice, which cannot be dispelled by assertions, but only by experiments and experience."

SICK PEOPLE always know where to find DR. BOURNE, because he has a superior mode of treating disease without medicines, bleeding, blistering, or plastering, by which he is enabled to remain as a fixture, instead of continually chopping and changing around. No. 10 Masonic Temple. Removed only twice in about twenty years.

HARTMANN, of Vienna, says: "Taking the general run of practitioners we can convince ourselves that the most of them exercise nothing but the rudest empyricism under the cloak of science."

THE DISASTROUS EFFECTS of quinine, and many other vegetable poisons in daily use by the medicine doctors, eradicated by the use of DR. BOURNE'S baths, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

GEITAMER writes that the Materia Medica "is a mere collection of fallacious observations."

A Physician quoted by d'Alembert, represents "Nature as fighting with disease. A blind man, armed with a club, (the physician,) comes to settle the difference. He first tries to make peace. Failing in that, he lifts his club and strikes at random. If he strikes the disease he kills it. If he strikes Nature he kills her." The same writer, says an eminent physician, after thirty years experience, declared he—"I am tired of guessing."

WHY DO THE SICK, who prefer water cure treatment, or to be cured without medicines, almost universally go to DR. BOURNE, No. 10 Masonic Temple? It is because he has had a varied and large experience during nearly a quarter of a century; has an improved system of his own, the result of practical knowledge, which is certain, rapid in curing, truly pleasant in course of treatment, and exactly adapted to the wants of Californians, effecting in weeks as much, or more, than the "slow coach" method of hydropathic colleges, and Eastern and European practice would in months. DR. BOURNE knows his art so well that he guarantees his promises to the sick, if so agreed, and performs all he promises, and more if possible. Fifteenth year (1866) in San Francisco.

DR. WHITING declares that the celebrated CULLEN "knew nothing or next to nothing." And also that "both the Materia Medica and Therapeutics are a perfect chaos."

A facetious definition of the term Physician by a Medical writer: "A physician is one who administers drugs, of which he knows nothing, to a stomach of which he knows less."

RHEUMATISM CURED—Cure guaranteed, and at the same time mercury and all other mineral poisons removed from the system, by DR. BOURNE, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

PROFESSOR WATERHOUSE says: "I am sick of learned quackery."

SAID a Medical writer: "It would be better for the world if the whole tribe of Medical doctors were extinct."

DR. REID: "If the employment of the Lancet was abolished altogether, it would, perhaps, save annually a greater number of lives than in any one year the sword has ever destroyed." [Before the American Rebellion?—DR. B.]

LOCKE, SMOLLET AND GOLDSMITH, all three Physicians, are said to have held their art in great contempt.

MERCURY, and all mineral poisons, removed from the human system; and at the same time rheumatism, neuralgia, etc., are cured by DR. BOURNE, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

GREAT REDUCTION IN LADIES' DRESS AND DRY GOODS.—The telegraph has informed us of the recent fall of prices in dress and dry goods in the New York market; and we are authorized to announce that the retail house of MEAGHER, TAAFFE & Co., of this city, in consequence of the dry goods tumble at the East, will open the coming week with a great reduction in the prices of their immense stock of goods; which will be marked down to lower rates than dry goods have ever been sold for for years back, as an especial bid for the great Holiday trade, and as the most effective means of reducing their large stock on hand.

The goods reduced in prices consist of ladies' dress goods—silks, empress cloths of every variety, poplins, etc., which have been reduced to the following figures:

5,000 yards Super French Empress Cloth, in plain and striped, at 50 cents—worth $1

6,000 yards Plain All-wool Poplins, at 75 cents—worth $1 25.

10,000 yards Fine All-wool Empress Cloth, all colors, at $1—worth $1 50.

200 Rich Brocade Silk Dresses at $40—worth $65.

Also—1,000 yards Rich Black Silks, from $1 50 to $7 per yard.

Cloaks and shawls will also be marked down to remarkable low rates. Among the latter are some rich and beautiful real camel's-hair India shawls; and, also, all kinds of domestic and house-keeping goods. Nor will the class of ornamental goods escape the reduction. We are assured that real point laces by the set or yard, and rich chantilla flounces and laces, lace curtains, etc., will be offered at figures greatly lower than they can be purchased elsewhere.

Of course this event will create a commotion in the dry goods trade, and thronged counters and a rush of purchasers will be the effect of it. And the grand result will be that the ladies will be most happy in procuring new and fashionable goods at such bargains; and the enterprising house of MEAGHER, TAAFFE & Co., will get most of the Holiday trade, make hundreds of new customers, and convert their immense stock of goods now on hand into cash.

SANTA CLAUS' VISITS.—Among the hundreds of thousands of visits of this ancient individual, will be that to the Masonic Temple, No. 1 Montgomery street, where he has been leaving orders for Boys' Clothing to be presented by him to them on Christmas morning. Santa Claus visits this above place regularly every Christmas morning, and others would do well to follow his example. Figel & Co. manufacture to order, and have ready for sale the largest supply of Youths' and Boys' Clothing to be had in any other establishment in the same line of business in the city. Their terms are moderate and the goods of the best quality. Call and leave your orders early, for Santa Claus has a great many orders to fill.

MY TRIP ON THE BLOCKADE-RUNNER, "BONNYBELL."

"MR. HASTINGS, the House wants you, please. I was to beg you to step directly into the parlor, Mr. Graysbrook said."

I had never seen our principal—generally a calm, rather proud man, who was kind to his dependents without forgetting his authority—so agitated as I now found him, pacing the room with quick, impatient strides, and muttering broken sentences to himself, as he knit his bushy eyebrows into a heavy frown. He suddenly stopped in his walk, looked me full in the face, and exclaimed:

"Hastings—Henry, my boy, I am going to put great trust in you; but I always liked you, lad, and I am sure you will do your best to help me. I wish I had spoken before. I am afraid Loring has ruined me!—utterly ruined me! As sure as the sun's in heaven, on the 26th of next month Graysbrook & Freek must suspend payment."

Then the truth came out. Loring, the head clerk's absence, which had been a mystery to all of us, was brought about by his being entrusted with an important mission by our principal, which was briefly as follows:

He had been instructed to make the best of his way to South Carolina, where, on certain plantations on the Ashley River, some thousand bales of cotton were lying ready for delivery.

These bales, doubly precious since the Federal blockade had sealed up the coast against open traffic, had been the property of a well-known factor, a certain Jonadab Bates, who had acquired the estates on which the staple was grown, paying the purchase-money by the aid of his British correspondent, Mr. Graysbrook. To guarantee these advances, Mr. Bates had pledged a portion of the crop. He was now dead, and his affairs in no small confusion, but his executors were willing to yield up the whole store of cotton to the English creditor, in consideration of a further payment in hard cash.

"And that was why I sent Loring," said the merchant. "The sum was a heavy one, and it was to be paid in gold, by express stipulation, gold commanding a very high premium in the South, as you are aware. But the cotton is of fair quality, and the quantity so considerable that, supposing that, by dividing the freight, and shipping it in different vessels, we got only one-half safely through the blockade, a great gain would result at present prices. By waiting, on the other hand, I risked the loss of the whole of my advances, as the cotton would be burned in case of a Federal invasion. Loring had been in America; you know who glibly he used to talk of Yankee manners and customs; and therefore I sent the vessel—though Heaven forgive me if I do him an injustice, since, perhaps, the poor fellow has been drowned, or made away with in the present disturbed state of the country."

Mr. Graysbrook went on to say that bills for a considerable amount would fall due on the 26th of the following month; bills which must be dishonored in case of the non-recovery of the sum which Loring had carried away with him, or of the much larger sum they had confidently anticipated as soon as a portion of the cotton should reach Liverpool.

Our principal had looked out with trustfulness for a letter from his emissary, and not receiving one, had written twice, by way of Bahama, but without effect. And on the arrival of the West Indian mail that morning, without any sign of the long overdue letter, the merchant's waning faith in his clerk had wholly departed.

Whether Loring's silence were due to misfortue or treachery, it was obvious that there was little chance of its being broken. And therefore, on the 26th, that fatal date, a commercial sword of Damocles would decend to cut short the existence of the long-respected firm of Graysbrook & Freek.

"And now Mr. Hastings, I want you to go to South Carolina!"

"I, sir?"

I was no great traveler, a trip to Paris, with an excursion ticket, having been my longest pilgrimage; and the proposition rather startled me.

"Yes, young man," said the old merchant, firmly. "If I could shake off some twenty years, I'd ask no one to do the errand for me; but, as it is, I must stop at home. Will you go, proceeding to Bahama by the packet that sails the day after to-morrow, and watching for a good chance of eluding the blockading fleet? You know Loring, and can identify him in case of need. You shall have full credentials in writing, and if you succeed I'll give you a thousand pounds. Is it a bargain?"

I replied at once, accepting the duty, but declining to receive the pecuniary recompense which my employer's liberality had suggested.

My outward voyage to Nassau was unadventurous enough.

Once arrived at Nassau, however, I began to realize the difficulties of my position. The little place presented and aspect of strange liveliness and bustle, such as before the war it had never shown. The harbor was crammed with craft of all sorts and sizes: the bay was full of shipping: the little streets were crowded; and there was a continual stir and turmoil on the quay, all too small for the press of traffic that daily poured in. All this animation, all this activity, had been caused by the Federal blockade of the Southern coast: and the cheerful faces of the burghers attested the fact that Nassau was the great emporium for contraband of war and smuggled cotton, and that much money was being spent in the island by those employed in this gainful but perilous commerce. Wherever I went, in tavern, grocery, store, or counting-house, there was but one all-engrossing topic, one common subject of interest—the blockade. Such and such a schooner had been taken; such a brig had been burned, cargo and all, to keep her out of Yankee hands; such a drogher had come in with cotton; such a steamer had got safe to Charleston, with so many thousand stand-of-arms on board. The Black-eyed Susan had been sunk by the U. S. gunboat Sloper—no, she had only received four round-shot in her hull, and had escaped among the sand-keys. Who had insured the Delight? They would lose smartly, for the vessel had been condemned; whereas the Fly-by-Night had got into Charleston securely, and her freight of Blakely guns was worth twenty-three thousand dollars, net profit.

All this gambling and venturing, this staking of fortunes on the speed of a vessel or the wariness of a captain, was thrillingly exciting to the brokers, merchants, and other speculators, who swarmed in the Nassau boarding-houses, and who had only a pecuniary interest in the game. But with me matters stood otherwise; for my hopes, and the stability of our firm, depended upon my making a safe and speedy run to and from the shores of South Carolina; and the capture, which to others was a mere vexation, would be a ruin to me. And I perceived that the risks nearly balanced the favorable chances; that if many escaped, many were taken; and the loss of a ship was philosophically borne by her owners.

Glad was I, therefore, when Captain Pritchard, of the Bonnybell, fast-going Clyde built, iron steamer, that had for several days lain idle in the bay, accosted me in the following tone:

"Good-morning, Mr. Hastings! On the island yet, I see. Ah, you can't do better than take a passage with us. We slip cable to-night, between ourselves and the post."

These last words were spoken in a very low tone, and with a cautious, sweeping glance that took in every object.

"To-night!" The words were wondrous tempting, for I had been already five days at Nassau, and time was running on cruelly fast toward that dreadful 26th proximo, when the protested bills of the honored old house should be the subject of city men's discourse, and the shutters should be put up, and the melancholy pilgrimage of Portugal street begin.

I had more than once turned a longing eye to the swift Clyde-built boat, lying anchored in the bay, like a sleeping sword-fish, with the British flag drooping lazily from her gaff, and a grisly Yankee gunboat watching her from afar off. And now she was going to sail. It was tempting, very tempting. Captain Pritchard saw my hesitation, and spoke again.

"Look here, Hastings; I've a notion you've some stronger reason than most, for wanting to get safe across to the Palmetto State, eh? You're a close fellow, and quite right too; but I've nosed out as much as that. If I hadn't a moral certainty that we'd do the trick, as I'm an honest man, I wouldn't say, come with us; but it's been made safe, as far as such touch-and-go-work can be safe. You'll promise to keep mum-chance about what I tell you, among those chattering boobies down-town, I mean? Well, then, listen to me."

And the skipper went on to tell me how he was to sail that night; how his cables were bent on a spring, ready to slip at short notice, without the delay of weighing anchor; how he had got his provisions and water on board; and every sailor and every ounce of coal embarked. He also mentioned that he was to take on board, at the last moment, a most excellent and experienced pilot, who had been recommended by the resident agent of the Confederate Government. Lastly, he informed me that several Southern gentlemen, some of them accompanied by their wives and children, returning from Europe, and who had long awaited a safe means of transport, were to be passengers on board the Bonnybell.

And with good show of reason, Captain Pritchard bade me reflect whether these persons—who, if taken, would be punished as traitors by the authorities at Washington—had not more at stake than I could possibly have, and were not likely to be good judges of the steamer's prospects as regarded the run.

"And the fare is fifteen guineas? Never mind, captain, I'll be one of your passengers. When do you start?"

The commander's voice sank to a whisper as he told me that at sunset every landsman must come on board, taking boat at some secluded jetty, to avoid prying eyes; and using all reasonable caution, since Nassau teemed with Northern spies. Half an hour after sundown he was to hoist a signal, which was to be replied to; and then the pilot would come off, and the steamer would stand out to sea.

"After dark," muttered Pritchard, with an oath, "we may hope to get past that Yankee thief that hangs about the island. The governor bade her keep at the distance of one marine league, but she's always sneaking in—now for coal, now for bread, now because her engine's out of order; and the United States consul communicates with her every day. I tell you, shipmate, there isn't one of us that isn't doged up and down by rascals in Federal hire. See there! that mulatto hound has been after me these four days," pointing out a dark complexioned fellow in the dress of a stevedore, who, on seeing himself observed, as he stood under the geranium hedge, lay down with well-feigned nonchalance and lit his pipe.

It was settled now. I was to leave the island that very night, I felt a feverish wish to succeed. It was with a new interest that I spent that afternoon in lounging and smoking Cuba cigars under the shade of a green-painted veranda, watching the blue sea, the many masts, the long, swift steamer lying so quiescent on the gentle heave of the summer surge, and the black hull and white funnels of the Yankee war-vessel that glided to and fro in front of the roadstead, like some hungry shark swimming slowly backward and forward across the bar of a harbor.

After dinner I paid my bill at the "Royal William" and struck off through a water-side lane, at the end of which was a small wharf. A dory was soon hired; and with an old black fisherman and his woolly-pated son at the oars, we shot merrily out into the broad, smooth waters of the bay.

The sun had just gone down. Night was coming on in the sudden way that pertains in the tropics; and, as if the drop-scene of a theatre had fallen, there was a complete change in the appearance of the island and its sheltered bay. A hazy mist, like floating clouds of white gauze, rolled from the eastward over the water, and through it the ships loomed like phantom vessels. The sky had deepened to the color of indigo; the brief twilight darkened with startling abruptness; and the jarring cries of night-birds suddenly arose from the brake-grown creeks that inrrowed the island.

"Here de steamer, sar! Bonnybell ahoy! You, Peter, catch hold ob de boat-hook. Dat all de baggage? Thank you, sar; and I beg, massa, for lily-white six-pence to drink 'um health and good voyage."

I found a great deal of quiet bustle and suppressed excitement on board the Bonnybell. The fires were banked up; the swarthy faces and red shirts of the engineer and his gang were visible at the hatch of their Cyclopean den, getting a breath of the cool breeze before starting. Some brass guns, that had been hidden under fruit-baskets, hencoops, and tarpaulins, were visible enough now, and beside them lay piled little heaps of round-shot. The crew bustled to and fro, and the captain was so busy that he could return but a brief word and a nod to my greeting. The sky grew darker, and surrounding objects dimmer every instant.

Before long, the passengers arrived. Several Southern gentlemen, a few ladies and children, all making their way back from Europe to their homes in Carolina or Virginia by this dangerous route, and all in peril of imprisonment, at least, in the event of capture. By the uncertain light, I could see that most of them were pale and nervous, but they talked in an undertone among themselves, and did not appear anxious to enter into conversation with strangers.

"Get up steam!"

By the time the hoarse roar of the escaping vapor grew loud and menacing, there was a fresh bustle on deck, and I heard the captain give orders to "stand by" for slipping from the moorings and to hoist the signal, as we only waited for the pilot.

"There they are, all right—three red lights and a green one!" murmured a tall Virginian at my elbow; and looking up, I saw the colored lamps glimmer from the masthead. Instantly they were answered by a similar signal from some window on shore.

"We'll soon see the pilot now," said Pritchard, rubbing his hands in a cheery manner; "the signal's made and repeated. In ten minutes our man will be with us. Hilloa!—boat ahoy!—what d'ye want?"

"Bonnybell ahoy!" was the rejoinder, in a shrill, harsh voice, cautiously lowered for the occasion, "pilot wants to come on board!"

There was a stir and a start of surprise among those on deck, and as a rope was thrown to the boatmen, Captain Pritchard bent over the side, exclaiming:

"You're uncommon quick, my hearty. If you've come from shore since the lights were hoisted, you must be own-cousin to the Flying Dutchman. Are you sure you're our pilot?"

"I'm the pilot engaged by Colonel Jeremy Carter, if that'll do," answered a very tall, bony, black-haired man, as he actively ascended the side. "Zack Foster's my name, and I know every inch about Charleston, where I was raised."

While the captain, reassured by the mention of Colonel Carter's name, gave hasty orders to cast off the cable, and go ahead, I, in common with the rest of the passengers, and the unoccupied portion of the crew, looked with much interest at the new comer. The latter was about forty years of age, long and lean of figure, with a hardy, sun-browned face. There was no mistaking the resolute air and daring of the man; his mouth was as firm as iron, though a little dry humor seemed to lurk about his lips; and I hardly liked the expression of his half-shut eyes, which had a lazy cunning in their dark glance. Still, though dressed in a black suit of shore-going clothes, and a swallow-tailed coat of antiquated cut, there was something about Mr. Zack Foster that bespoke the thoroughbred seaman. He took no share in the proceedings, for his duty did not begin till we were clear of Nassau roadstead; but yet he seemed impatient for the start, gnawing viciously at his quid, and drumming on the taffrail with a finger that seemed as hard and brown as bronze.

It was an anxious time when the Bonnybell, under a full head of steam, went darting out of the bay; her look-outs straining their eyes to pierce the mist, and give warning to the helmsman of vessels ahead; while Pritchard walked to and fro, too fidgety and eager to endure conversation, listening every instant for some sound which might indicate that the Federal cruiser had taken the alarm.

But on we went, without check or hindrance; and we all drew our breath more freely as the lights of the town began one by one to vanish, as if the sea had swallowed them, and the dark headlands faded away into obscurity.

The American gunboat was neither seen nor felt, a circumstance I did not the less regret, because I perceived, not only by the display of the cannon alluded to, but by the resolute demeanor of several of the crew, who stood grouped about a couple of uncovered arm-chests, that our pigmy foe would not have found an entirely unresisting prize.

One slight circumstance, hardly, as I thought, worth mentioning, did occur before we had run half a mile to seaward. There came a long, faint hail, from so great a distance as to be hardly distinguishable even by a sailor's practiced ear, but which was announced to be addressed to us.

"Some boat with a message, perhaps, for a passenger. The lubbers deserve a rope's-ending for being so late. Can I lie-to safely, do you think?" said Pritchard to the pilot, irresolutely, and giving the word, "Slacken speed!"

What the pilot answered I know not. I only caught the concluding phrase:

"Yankee tricks; so, cap, you'd best look sharp about you."

So Pritchard thought. He passed the word "go ahead!" and we heard no more about the matter.

The run was speedy and pleasant, over a dimpling summer sea, with no boisterous behavior on Neptune's part to make even the lady passengers uneasy.

We saw several vessels, but none of a hostile character; and the voyage was as agreeable and safe hitherto as any yachting excursion in holiday waters.

We were all disposed to be pleased; and the pilot, although a saturnine and morose personage, viewed through this rose-colored haze of satisfaction and hope, became a popular man on board. Captain Pritchard pronounced him worth his weight in gold; for if there were no gales or rough seas to thwart our purpose, fogs were rather frequent, and here the pilot's intimate acquaintance with the rocks, shoals, and islets, many of which were not noted down in the chart, more that once saved the Bonnybell from an ugly thump upon some hidden obstacle. For an American, Zack Foster was singularly silent; yet there was something elephantine about his high forehead and narrow dark eyes which suggested shrewdness rather than vacuity. He did his work, answered when spoken to, but seldom addressed any one.

"Land, ho!" sung out the look-out man at the mast-head, and Pritchard and the pilot, who were poring together over the map close to the binnacle, looked up, while passengers edged nearer to hear the news.

Pritchard lifted his telescope, while Foster went aloft for a better view.

"Edisto Island, as I said, cap!" hailed the pilot; "and beyond it is the Carolina coast. We're close to home, gentlemen and ladies."

There was a cheer from the little group gathered near the helm, but directly afterward came two shrill cries of "Sail, ho!"

"Uncle Sam's barkers. We must put out a few miles yet, cap," said the pilot, as he leisurely descended the rope ladder.

There were many good glasses on board, and we all gazed eagerly through them, and with beating hearts we recognized the port holes, the grinning cannon, the "star-spangled" flags, and warlike display of the Federal blockading squadron.

The steamer was put about, and we stood further out, until shore and ships were alike lost to view.

The disappointment of the passengers, who had been granted a mere glimpse of the land that to them was home, was considerable; but none could doubt the prudence of delaying our entry into Charleston harbor until night should assist us in eluding the hostile war-vessels.

There was no going to bed on board the Bonnybell that night; we all kept to the deck, eagerly gazing out over the sparkling and phosphorescent sea, glimmering and glancing with St. Elmo's fires.

There was a pale young moon—a mere sickle of silver—in the sky; and objects were so faintly discernible that the utmost caution was necessary. The second mate took the helm, while the first mate superintended the almost constant heaving of the lead, and the captain and pilot stood on the forecastle, noting the replies of the sailor, chanted as they were in a shrill monotone, in accordance with old custom.

"Ten fathoms, sheer!—by the deep, nine!—by the mark, seven!" called out the leadsman, from the chains.

"Water allays does shoal here, cap. I know the channel, though, as well as I know my parlor ashore, at Nantucket—at Savannah, I mean," said the pilot, with some confusion.

"By the mark, five!" was the next call.

Captain Pritchard here grew uneasy. He did not pretend to equal the pilot in local knowledge, but he was too good a seaman not to take alarm at the abrupt lessening of the depth of the water. He gave orders to reduce the speed, and we moved slowly on, the lead going as before.

"Are you sure, Mr. Foster, you are not mistaken? It seems to me the water shoals at the rate of a fathom for every hundred yards traversed. We may have missed the Swash, left Moultrie to leeward, and got into the net-work of sand-banks near. Hilloa!—what's that ahead of us? Boats, as I am a sinner!"

The pilot thrust his hand rapidly into the breast of his coat, drew out something, and flung it on the deck, where it instantly began to sputter and hiss, and directly afterward the lurid glare of a blue-light flashed through the darkness, showing funnel and rigging, the pale faces of the passengers, the narrow channel of fretted water, and the sandy islets on either bow. Nor was this all, for by the ghastly light we could distinguish two dark objects on the foamy sea ahead of us—boats, full of men, pulling swiftly, but noiselessly toward us; and, no doubt, with muffled oars.

"By the mark, two!—shoal water—we'll ground!" cried an ill-boding voice, that of the sailor in the chains; and, at the same moment, the Bonnybell came suddenly to a check, throwing most of the landsmen from their feet, while the ominous scrooping of the keel told that the steamer was aground. A loud clamor arose, many voices shouting at once in tones of inquiry, dismay, or command; but even above this turmoil arose the hurrah of those who manned the boats, and who now came dashing up, pulling and cheering like madmen.

"Treachery! treachery!" cried several of the passengers and crew, pointing to where the pilot stood, beside the blue-light, that his own perfidious hand had kindled, while already the man-of-war's men—for such we could not doubt them to be—began to scramble on board.

"The Yankee bloodhounds, sure enough; but you shall not live to share the prize-money!" exclaimed Pritchard, snatching up a handspike, and aiming a blow at Mr. Zack Foster, that would have been a lethal stroke, had not that astute person swerved aside, receiving the weapon on his left shoulder. Our men set up a faint cheer, and a shot was fired, luckily without effect. But resistance would have been madness, so thickly did the American sailors crowd up our gangway, their pistols and cutlasses ready for the fray, while among them were nine or ten marines, well armed with musket and bayonet, and who drove the Bonnybell's crew below hatches without any serious show of fighting. The Federal lieutenant in command, to do him justice, seemed anxious that no needless violence should be used; and while proclaiming the vessel a prize to the boats of the U. S. war-brig Dacotah, he yet restrained the fury of that precious guide, Mr. Zack Foster, who had recovered from the effects of his knock-down blow, drawn a bowie-knife, and rushed upon Pritchard, who was struggling in the hands of his captors.

"Gently, sir," said the lieutenant; "gently, Quartermaster Fitch. These caged birds are under Uncle Sam's protection, and I cannot allow any ill-usage of my prisoners. Do you hear me, sir?"

"Quartermaster!" exclaimed poor Captain Pritchard, as his wrists were thrust into handcuffs, "you don't mean that that double-dyed villain, that Judas of a pilot is a Yankee petty officer, after all! I wish I'd only guessed the truth a few hours back, and—and if I swung for it—I'd have chucked the spy overboard as I would a mangy puppy!"

The lieutenant made no answer, but ordered the captain and mates to be sent below, and proceeded at once to seize the steamer's papers, to place the passengers under arrest, and then compelled the engineer to take the Bonnybell off the sand-bank with the rising tide. We ran down, under the skillful pilotage of Mr. Fitch, to Edisto Island, in which anchorage we came to our moorings, under the guns of the Dacotah, and within a short distance of several other vessels of the blockading squadron. Here we spent the night miserably enough; sentries mounting guard at our hatchways with fixed bayonets, and the whole of the passengers being huddled together in the chief cabin.

In the morning a commission of American officers came on board, and held a cursory inspection of the ship's papers and cargo. Nothing could be more conclusive. Sabres, saddles, firearms, medicines, and percussion-caps, made up four-fifths of our freight. Our passenger list comprised many noted foes of the Government. It was certain that the Bonnybell would be condemned by any prize court, and it was at once decided to send her round, under her present guardianship, to Hampton Roads, to be adjudicated upon.

My heart had never been so heavy as during that wretched voyage northward, with the stars and stripes flying at our mast-head, where lately the British flag had flown so merrily. It was not on account of any real danger to myself that I was thus depressed. A few weeks' imprisonment in some gloomy Federal fort was the worst fate that could befall me, and my release was certain when my neutrality was once established. But the delay would be fatal to the purpose which had brought me to America. I should either not reach South Carolina at all or I should reach it too late. The 26th proximo—always terribly near—would arrive while I was still a prisoner, and the respected old firm of Graysbrook & Freek would figure in the Gazette. My own prospects would be blighted, or, at least, deeply injured, by the ruin of my kind old employer. Mr. Graysbrook, I knew was too just to blame me for the breakdown of my hopes and plans; but still——

"That' the town of Hampton, Mister, and yon's the camp of our troops; and there's the fort, where you are like to be located a goodish time," said a drawling voice, breaking in upon my bitter reflections just as the Bonnybell's anchor bit the ground in Hampton Roads.

I turned, and shrank instinctively back from the spy, Foster, or Fitch, who stood at my elbow with an exultant twinkle in his eye. He could not but observe my gesture, for he went on:

"No malice; you'll be none the worse, after all; and you'll be let out in a week or two. Them Southern chaps hev more reason to look ugly than you hev, I can tell you. But wasn't the thing smart, and prettily done? Answer me that. Our consul spent a considerable lump of dollars, I calculate, for information about what this Bonnybell was doing at Nassau. Then we found out the signals and passwords, and out come I—Dan Fitch, of the U. S. Navy—and get welcomed aboard as the pilot chosen by that bloody rebel, Colonel Carter. And before we got clar off, the real pilot's canoe gives chase, and they hail and hail till they're hoarse, and your blind bat of a British captain, he takes no notice—ha! ha! You must sing small, you must, you old-country folks, when you rub shoulders with Columbia's children. Here comes the boat, with the marshal aboard of her."

He spoke truly. The pinnace that now ran alongside was that of the Federal provost-marshal; and we, the prisoners, with but few necessaries selected from our baggage, were compelled to embark in her, and were taken on shore.

At the gate of the fort that was to be our prison, a number of negroes, Irish laborers, straggling soldiers, and shrill-voiced women were crowding around a cart, which was escorted by two cavalry men, in their faded blue jackets.

As we drew near, and as the marshal pompously demanded the meaning of this encumbrance, the mob divided, and we could see that the helpless form of a wounded man, wrapped in a blood-stained blanket, was being lifted out of the cart.

"Give him a dhrink, some of you. A little spherits in the wather would revive the poor crayture," said a red-haired Irish woman in the crowd; and then the weak voice of the sufferer reached me, and, to my surprise, seemed familiar to my ears. Could it be? Yes—not a doubt of it; it was Christopher Loring, the man I had come across the Atlantic to seek out, the trusted depositary of the funds for want of which Graysbrook & Freek must suspend payment.

Loring it was; though the wan, pinched face, on which death's mark was already visible, was miserably changed from the handsome, healthy countenance of my former fellow-clerk, gay Kit Loring.

He knew me at once, and closed his eyes, groaning; but immediately afterward looked wistfully up in my face, and held out his feeble hand, murmuring something about "forgiveness" and "restitution," and that he hoped I would sit beside him till he died, "for the sake of old times."

"He is bleeding to death," the surgeon said.

"Bleeding inwardly, too; so the doctors can't do a cent's worth of good;" said one of the troopers. "It was Jem the scout that plugged him with a bullet, for trying to sneak past him in the woods, but I believe he's no rebel, after all."

So, indeed, it turned out. Poor wretch, he died within the hour; but preserved his faculties long enough to make a confession, which was reduced to writing by the governor of the fort.

He had gone out to America, meaning honestly, so he protested. But it chanced that the cotton in question had been made away with—burned, I believe, in some accidental conflagration, and the money in Loring's charge could not be spent as Mr. Graysbrook had directed. After long and fruitless waiting, and three attempts to communicate with his employer for instructions (the letters were intercepted by the blockading fleet, like those of Mr. Graysbrook), Loring had yielded to the temptation of appropriating the money to his own use.

He had formed an intimacy with a notorious blackleg and sharper from New Orleans, who had proposed to him a partnership; and this pair of worthies had designed to make their way north, and to set up a gaming-house in Washington. In attempting, however, to elude the frontier guards, Loring's partner had been shot dead, and he himself mortally wounded.

He died professing much penitence, begging me to say to Mr. Graysbrook that he had "never known peace" since his wrong-doing, and calling on all present to bear witness that the large sum found on his person was the property of the House.

Little more remains to be told. The British Legation promptly procured my release, on a proper representation of the case being made, and I was permitted to return home, carrying with me the money found on the person of the defaulter, and which was scarcely diminished by any extravagance of his.

I arrived at Liverpool on the evening of the 26th, traveled all night, and at ten next morning—the morning of the dreaded 26th—I was at my post in the office, and was able to place the money in the merchant's hands.

The bills were paid, and not the shadow of a suspicion ever fell upon the honored name of our firm.

Mr. Graysbrook was not ungrateful, for not only am I in receipt of Loring's former salary and authority in the counting-room, but it has been kindly notified to me that I am to be taken into partnership before the year comes to a close—the youngest partner, our chief says, with good-humored reproach, that ever figured on the ledger of Graysbrook & Freek.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1866.

BLACK SHEEP.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued in to-day's CALIFORNIAN.

DEMAGOGISM.

THERE is now, and there has been ever since the machinery of our government was set in motion by the first popular election under the Constitution, a class of politicians who rely entirely upon cajolery and the lowest arts of the demagogue in their appeals to the people. It is a still more shameful fact that the vast majority of the daily newspapers of the United States, habitually employ the same arts, as constituting the legitimate weapons of partizan warfare. No sooner is an active canvass begun, than we find even leading and influential papers—possessing all the elements that are popularly held to constitute that exceedingly vague and intangible something known as journalistic "respectability," (which seems upon analysis to resolve itself into business prosperity) appealing to the narrowest prejudices and the meanest passions, in order to influence votes. This is especially noticeable in the "arguments" addressed to foreigners. Men of education and character occupying the editorial chair, seem to adopt a code of morality, at least during well-contested "campaigns" that does not place even slander and falsehood under interdict, provided they are done by indirection, and not too coarsely. As to fair honest argument, that is too dull for the purpose, and a decorous moderation of language would be voted tame.

One of the most disgusting illustrations of the lengths to which leading politicians and journals are willing to go in the teeth of knowledge and conscience, in their attempts win votes for their party, is furnished by the language held by many of them in reference to the Fenian raid upon Canada. Every man of sufficient intelligence to justify him in the expression of an opinion concerning public affairs, knows that it was President Johnson's simple duty to pursue the course he did in reference to the movement. No class of citizens, or of foreigners residing in the United States have any right to make our soil the base of hostile operations against a power with which we are at peace. The attempt to do so is an insult to the sovreignty of our laws, and the expectation that the government can look on without interference is preposterous. And yet, men occupying high positions in public life, and journals of extended influence in their party, were not ashamed to seize upon the opportunity thus afforded for the purpose of making political capital against the President by denouncing him for an act which they must in reality have regarded as the most creditable of his whole public career. It was used against him in the canvass in New York, and as is supposed with considerable effect, for the purpose of affecting the Fenian vote. It is difficult to imagine a more disgraceful spectacle than is presented by an intelligent editor or public speaker deliberately attempting to excite the prejudices of the people against an Executive, for what the writer or orator believes all the while to have been the discharge of an imperative duty.

We are glad, however, to find that lights are not entirely wanting to relieve the shades of this humiliating picture. Two at least, of the leading journals published in the city of New York which are hostile to the President and his policy, have had the principle to applaud him for his course in regard to the Fenian raid on Canada, and to rebuke the demagogues of their own party who have sought to make political capital against him by vulgar appeals to the prejudices of citizens of foreign birth. The journals to which we refer, are Harper's Weekly and the Nation. Both of these papers have been most decided in their opposition to the President's policy of reconstruction, and have shown themselves willing and eager to avail themselves of all honorable and legitimate means of waging warfare against him. We trust that the good example which they have set, may find many imitators among the leading political dailies.

A WRITER says that it is a sure test of love when a woman tells a man who is smoking in her presence that she "adores tobacco smoke." Let a man attempt to blow a cloud in the company of a woman who don't care a fig for him, and then let him look in her countenance for approbation. If he don't find considerable of what Byron calls "silent thunder," then he will prove a very lucky man, and the lady will be of more than angel.

THE PRIVILEGES OF WEALTH.

NEW YORK, Boston, Philadelphia, and many others of the great Atlantic cities, are indebted for many of their most beneficent public institutions, to the liberality and enlightened philanthropy of individual citizens, who having accumulated large fortunes, used considerable portions of their wealth in founding libraries, lyceums, colleges, or "institutes" for the benefit of the people. Among the men who have earned a title to the gratitude of posterity in this way, Peter Cooper of New York is entitled to rank among the foremost. The Institute which he founded, is more original in its design, and wider in its scope, than either the Astor Library or the Girard College. The seventh annual report of the Cooper Union, which has recently been published, tells a story which is full of matter for reflection, a story which shows in a most impressive manner how vast an amount of good may be effected by individual wealth when its power is wielded by men of public spirit, of large benevolence and enlightened philanthropy. The plan of the "Union" embraces evening shools, open to all who wish to avail themselves of their advantages, with organized courses of study extending through a term of years, concluding with examinations and certificates or diplomas attesting the acquirements and qualifications of the pupils. There is also an evening school for the benefit of young men and women who are absorbed during the day in practical occupation. The evening schools are divided into the departments of "science" and "art." In the scientific department algebra, plane, solid, and analytical geometry, the differential calculus, mechanics, natural philosophy, and chemistry are taught, the entire course covering a period of five years. In the art school the pupils are instructed thoroughly in architectural and mechanical drawing, and in drawing from life. During the winter of 1865 the number of persons of both sexes who participated in the benefits of this course of gratuitous instruction averaged over one thousand. In addition to these night schools, the "Union" maintains a "School of Design for Women," with over two hundred pupils, music classes with about four hundred pupils, and a class for instruction in English literature numbering between one and two hundred pupils. Among the other features of this most original and most noble institution, are an extensive picture gallery and a library and reading-room, which during the last year were visited, as is estimated, by nearly half a million of persons. Occasional lectures on literary, social, and scientific subjects, are delivered under the direction of the trustees. When we consider that this great institution, with its vast and incalculable power for diffusing culture among the masses of the people, and affording the advantages of an education to all who can appreciate them, is the result of the liberality of one New York merchant, we obtain a most suggestive and striking idea of the power and the privileges of wealth in the hands of men of large hearts and enlightened understandings.

THE NEWSPAPER WAR.

THE great journalistic three-cornered duel is still in spirited progress, the Times seeming, so far as the papers of this metropolis is concerned, to be in very much the situation of Mr. Pickwick in the pound—with "no friends." In the interior, however, the case is different. The Grass Valley National, and quite a large number of equally influential organs of provincial opinion, take up the cudgels for the new paper, and enroll themselves among its admirers and well wishers. Meantime the charges and countercharges exchanged by the rivals, in regard to the dispatches, and the boasts of each asserting the superiority of its own news, are beginning to grow stale and wearisome. In conducting this warfare, it must be admitted, in simple justice, that the Times has thus far evinced more tact, good taste, and self-control, than its opponents. It has never lost its temper, or indulged in vituperative language. Last night's Bulletin, in an article entitled "The Times as a Reliable Newspaper," says:

"The Times yesterday published the following malicious and false dispatch:

'NEW YORK, December 12.—Simonton has been deposed by the Ring as News Agent, and is succeeded by one Stone.
GAMBLE.'

"The document was placed at the head of the Times' telegraphic reports, in order, as we suppose, to make it as conspicuous as possible, and was accompanied by malicious comments.

"To-day we have the following telegram from the New York Association:

'BUFFALO, December 13.—To all Editors and Agents.—I am authorized by Mr. Simonton to state that the report telegraphed yesterday, by Craig, that Mr. J. W. Simonton had been removed from his position as General Agent, and that there was a general row, etc., is a baseless fabrication. Nothing of the kind has occurred. If Craig's report has been published, you will please publish this denial. TILLINGHAST.'

"We are willing to suppose that the Times was misled by Craig, but the conductors of that journal show themselves not much better than the person who set afloat the falsehood, for the object was slander, which the comments make most manifest. But the telegraphic misrepresentation is of a piece with paragraphs published in the Times every few days."

Meantime reflecting persons who have been in the habit of carefully perusing the dispatches received for the past month or so, are fast coming to the conclusion that they are so full of contradictions, surmises, rumors, and uncertainties, that they are scarcely worth quarrelling about, and that so far as reliability and intrinsic value are concerned, there is very little to choose between Craig's and Simonton's.

ENGLISH AFFAIRS.

SOME three months ago, upon the receipt of the intelligence of the Hyde Park riot, and the significant speech made upon the subject in the House of Commons by John Stuart Mill, we published an article in THE CALIFORNIAN, in which we expressed our conviction that the overthrow of the present English system of government was at hand, and that speedy and thorough reform was the only means of averting violent revolution. These views were, at the time, characterized as rash; and in certain quarters they even provoked unstinted ridicule; but within the past week we see them taken up in various quarters, and repeated in almost the precise language which we employed three months ago. When we hear of two hundred thousand Englishmen marching through the streets of London displaying the American Flag, and bearing banners inscribed "Manhood Suffrage," revolution, rather than reform is indicated. But we trust it may prove a peaceful and bloodless revolution, as, indeed, it can scarcely fail to do, with such men as Bright and Mill for its leaders, and with so vast a preponderance of physical force enlisted on its side as to make opposition utterly futile. The conservative press of England still speak of it as a "Reform Agitation." That is a mild name; but call it what they will it is not destined to stop until it has effected the repeal of the laws of primogeniture, and swept away the last vestiges of the English system of aristocracy.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[THE Editors of THE CALIFORNIAN cannot engage to furnish answers to interrogatories propounded in this department. They will be glad, however, to publish replies supplied by correspondents.]

REPLY TO "T. W. F."

MR. EDITOR:—In your last issue I notice a communication signed "T. W. F." purporting to be an answer to a query made in one of your previous papers by a frequenter of a prominent club in the city in reference to W. W. Story, the poet and sculptor.

It is no easy matter to see what connection "T. W. F.'s" epistle has with the brief inquiry of the man who picks up his items about club houses. The latter individual, although exhibiting a pitiable ignorance, is specific enough, and does not seek to hide his purpose under a mass of loose phraseology.

His question was simple, and three lines would have sufficed for an answer. Now, I declare, without any mental reservation whatsoever, that "T. W. F." seems desirous under the specious appearance of displaying his erudition of lugging you off into a fatal political maelstrom. If he is your friend see to it that you are not ruined by permitting him an unlimited scope over a field which may establish his claims to political ingenuity at the expense of a literary reputation which you have earned deservedly by the just treatment of literary subjects.

If Mr. Story has seen fit to relinquish this government under which he was born for that in which his ancesters lie buried, it is manifestly for reasons best known to himself.

There is a marked vein of prejudice running through the whole of "T. W. F.'s" theory inconsistent with a true solution of the question. If Mr. Story is an ardent believer in the doctrines of miscegenation a wider field is certainly offered in this country than in England for their practical development. The praise of the Atlantic Monthly clique has not unfrequently been bestowed upon individuals whose fidelity to Caucasian integrity of race is undeniable. The powerful poem in question does not belong to any of the schools of that art originated or imitated in Puritanical New England. It simply revives in glowing colors a love episode in the life of an illustrious Roman and an Egyptian queen.

The poet takes his stand-point in the Roman classic age, and amid the circumstances surrounding Roman and Egyptian customs, religion and modes of thought. Cleopatra does not speak with the ineffable sentiments of Christian morality, but in a language consistent with the belief that all joy is of the earth, and circumscribed in its keenest raptures within the sphere of sensuality. Would we expect a poet with such a subject before him to treat it otherwise? Would it be fair to attribute his success to "a strained 'and factitious imagination, or to an erotic and morbid state of mind?"

Mr. Louis Agassiz has seen fit to renounce the land of his birth, and has obtained letters of American citizenship. He is located in the very "hub" of the universe; he is praised by the Atlantic Monthly coterie; he has lately paid a visit to the torrid zone for the advancement of ichthyology. Does not this argue that he has settled among us, denationalized himself, and all out of pure love for miscegenation?

Mrs. Woxcackle on Lunches and Life Insurance, with a Postscript Touching the New Trouble in Regard to St. James.

MR. EDDYTER: Mr. Woxcackle is so set against lunch partys, wich he says, wenever I give one, on that day he is sure to git but the leaveings for dinner, wich indeed happened once, the party sitting down late, and the conversasbun being so interesting, and all the ladys having so much to say on the subjeck, it being the dny after a resent skandalus okurrense in sosyity, that we remained at tayble in annymatid discushun until the dinner ower had almost arrivd.

Consekwently, to avoyd unplesant domestik seens, I now take those opportunytys wen Mr. Woxcackle is out of town, to invite n few lady frends to lunch, and to enjoy an intellektnal plasure wich these free and unrestrained getherings of a few conjeenyal minds affords. Accordingly, on Wensday, Mr. W. heing on one of his peryoddycnl visits to San Hosay, I had Mrs. Van Slamm, Mrs. Wiskyrich, Mrs. Blower, and a few other frends to lunch, with no gentlemen of course to cast a chill of constrayut over the occashun by their presence, and to confine the flow of conversashun to bizniss and pollytics. The princerpal objeckt of this communycashun is, however, to obtane your opinyun on a question that arose between Mrs. Wiskyrich and Mrs. Blower, about life inshureance. The case heing allooded to, of the widow of a young married man who had resently died, and she, tbo' occupying a posishun in sosyity, being left without means to maintayn it, Mrs. Blower observed that the diseased was a brute for not gitting his life inshnred prevyus to diseasing, tho' why people who are dead shood be called diseased, when deth is the certin cure of all diseases, perhaps can be explayned by a Phillydelfy lawyer, but is a mistery to me inscrootable. Whereupon Mrs. Van Slumm assentid to the opinyun, and kwotid Scripter for it, namely the text that he that provideth not for those of his own household is worse than an intydel. Then every one begun to tell how much her husband was inshured for, and the stait of his heltb, and how old he was, etcetery; and Mrs. Wiskyrich said her's wasn't inshured, and why should he be? Thank the Lord she was in no danger of being left unprovided for But Mrs. Blower shook her head and' "You don't know, my dear," says she, "we don't none of us know the stait of our husbands affairs, or what dets and hizniss complikashuns there may be when things come to be settled up, or how much there may be left out of what evry one thor't a large fortune. And besides," pursood she, "its a handy thing to have ten or fifteen thousnnd in cash, in case anything happens, for when estaits go into the Probnit Court, they're lyable to he tide up a ycar and a day, and what with lawyers, and executivs, nnd administrativs, etsetery, the money is dredful slow in coniug, and its dredful apt when it does come to be not half as much as was expektid."

This evydently prodoosed an impreshun on Mrs. W., who deklared that Mr. W. shood have no peace of bis life till it was inshnred. Then little Mrs. Wiffin spoke up, (she's only been marrid a few months) and says she all of a tremble, "I think the very idear of it is horrid!" "And what is it child," says Mrs. Vnn Slamm, "that is so horrid?" "The idear," says she, "of making mony by the deth of any one you love. I woodn't have my husband inshnred for the world, and if he did, and he shood die, I woodn't touch a doller of it." At wich of coarse we all laffed. and Mrs. Van Slamm called hor a dear foolish sentymental little puss, and said she'd be more sensible by the time she had her first buby, at wich the poor roamantick child flushed up to the roots of her hair, and Mrs. Blower stared at her, and wispered loud enough for evry one to hear that people shood not go into sosyity till they got red of the noshuns of the nussery, at wich Mrs Van Slamm giv one of her breezy laffs, and says she, "Well, they generly git red of childish noshuns soon enuff in Californy," and turning to Mrs Wiffin, tells her she's a grater kurosity than any in the Musynm, and ort to he put in a glass case nnd exibited.

Bnt I am becoming prolicks and must konclude, by staiting the pint disputid between Mrs. Wiskyrich nnd Mrs. Blower, wich is wether there is enny way by wich a marrid woman can effekt an inshurance on the life of her husband unbeknown to him; plese faver me with your opinynn, and forever oblige Yours Respectful,

MARIA WOXCACKLE.

P. S.—O my poor nerves! I fear that I shall go distractid. Mrs. Van Slamm has jest been in with the most exciting uoos that I have lisend to since the suspenshun of that saint on earth, if sech there he in mortal form, wich I allood to Mr. Eagan. It seems we air to have wars and dissenshuns in the boosum of the Church. The Bishop has forbid dancing at the St. James' Festervoll at Platt's Hall on Christmas eve, and threatened excommunycashnn, and Mr. Eagan will not give in, and is backed by his frends, and there will he a skandalus sisum wich will afford malisbus pleshure to the dissenters and sektarys. For my part I can't nnderstand it, having thort that the Church was more liberal in regard to amoosements, sech as opery, dancing, etsetery, than the Prispayteerins and sekts. Mrs. Van Slamm says the Bishop is set to have his way, and Mr. Eagnn and his frends air jest as set to have theirn, and it can't be made up. Also the staudin committy bas been in seshun two days nnd nites steddy, deliberating, and has resolved upon extream measbnrs, and somethink dredful is expected. I am trooly in a strait of distress cqual to nooralgy.

An Important Question.

The Bulletin of Wednesday published the following telegraphic despatch:

"It is reported that the physicians of the Empress Cnrlotta fear the absolute loss of her reason as well as her life."

We had never, until after reading tbe above paragraph, reflected on whether or not the loss of reason would he a calamity to a person after death. It occurs to us now that it may be preferable to die in one's right senses. To lose one's life is terrihle, bnt to lose one's senses as well as one's life may be still worse. We know nothing of the next world, and cannot tell whether a person leaving this world hereft of reason recovers it in the next. The above short paragraph in the Bulletin will perhaps lead to pschyological speculations which may result in much good.

Fortune-Telling.

The American masses being cousiderably smarter than the unedn cated classes of Great Britain are not so carefully protected hy their Government from injuries to their health, fortune, or moral principles to which they render themselves liable by their credulity and stupidity. The government of Great Britain has laws which visit with se vere punishment the offense of fortune-telling. England, uckuowledging that she has in her dominions a great number of fools, does her best to protect them from the rogues, who consider that by a merciful provision of Providence fools have been created especially for their benefit. America, hy providing free schools for the rising geuer ation, does much towards preveuting the increase of fools, and considers that having given her children knowledge they ought to be protected by the laws only in cases where they show some desire to protect themselves. The laws of this country deal most mercifully with quacks. England, every now and again, condemns an unlicensed medical practitioner to penal servitnde for ten or fifteen years to expiate the crime of manslaughter, when he has simply made a mistake and caused his patient's death by giving him the wrong kind of pills. When a woman "lays ont the cards" for a servant girl, and receives sixpence or a shilling for reading her destiny she often meets with a fate concerning which the cards told her nothing. She could read that the servant girl would shortly receive a letter, that n dark man and a fair man would visit her and make an important communication to her, and that she would shortly afterwards travel; but she could not have told her that a couple of policemen would call nnd request her attendance at the police court; she could not prophecy that the servant's evidence would he sufficient to convict herself and send her for six months to the House of Correction, while the servant, in consequence of encouraging a fortune-teller would be discharged and have to travel in search of a situation. Yet all this was "on the cards" when she accepted compensation for telling the girl's fortnne. The English Government does not believe that any human being has the power of reading the mysteries of the Future, and therefore decides that money paid to a fortune-teller has been obtained by false representations made to the party by whom it was paid. Tho foolish ones of San Francisco are left entirely at the mercy of these fortune-tellers, who obtain money under the false pretence that they possess the power of foretelling events. Six of these mischievous characters who delude silly women, and do an infinity of harm, advertise in one of the dailies of this city. One of the pieces of information most frequently imparted to a married woman, is: "You do not live happily with your husband." Then she is told that he does not love her and that she does not care for him. Under these painful circumstances, or indeed, under any circumstances—even if the inquirer does not accept the first pieces of information as facts—it is sure to please her to be told "There is a dark man (if she be fair, or fair man if she be a brunette,) who loves you dearly." Many a woman will gladly believe this, and if she he really a true wife will comfort herself by the reflection that "no harm will come of it." We do not of course maintain that many wives who love their husband are in the habit of "going to have their fortunes told." Often the vile prophecies of these pests of society have brought about their own fulfillment. That their trade is a profitable one is evident from the fact of so many following it. If the Board of Supervisors were, however, to pass an ordinance forbidding fortune-telling it might be that the Courts of law would throw on the Supervisors the onus probandi—would require positive proof of the impossibility of any person foretelling events—and thus the fortune tellers, like the swill-milk dealers, would, in conseqnence of the glorious uncertainty of the law, escape unpunished and still pursue their nefarious occupation.

Insanity of Rev. Mr. Jones.

The statement made by the Bulletin to the effect that the insanity of Rev. Mr. Jones was superinduced by religious excitement, has called forth a communication from "W.," which appears in Thursday's issue of the Bulletin. "W." says:

"EDITOR BULLETIN.—In your issue of last evening, you state of Rev. Mr. Jones of Santa Clara, just sent to the Insane Asylum, that "his symptoms of insanity were only manifest about 10 days ago," and that "Religious excitement is supposed to be the cause of his insanity." Both these statements are incorrect. The facts are that he has had a tendency to insanity from early life. Many years ago he was confined in an insane asylum for several months, and during the last 18 months he has often developed marked evidence of the same terrible malady. There has been no religious excitement connected with his parish in many months. The immediate cause of the present paroxysm (not necessary to name here) was of a very different character. By publishing the above, you will do justice to the truth, and gratify scores of friends and readers who are deeply grieved at the unintended error of your reporter."

Until this letter from "W." appeared hundreds of spiritualists in this city were in a high state of rejoicing. Mrs. Ada Hoyt Foye was about to make arrangements for a grand spiritual jollification, Mrs Laura Cuppy was in ecstacies of delight, and two hundred and thirty-two "trance medinms" were seriously considering the propriety of having a grand torch-light procession. The reason of the extraordinary excitement manifested by the spiritualistic Professors and Professoresses is evident. For some time past one of the great objections urged against spiritualism—or spiritism—by its opponents, has been that a large proportion of its followers eventually find their way into lunatic asylums. The spiritualists on the other hand claim that insanity is more frequently superinduced by "revivals" instituted by old fashioned religious associations than hy spiritualistic "seances." "W." was of course aware of these facts, and therefore his letter to the Bulletin, in order to protect the Christian religion from reproach. The Christian religion is defended at the expense of Rev. Mr. Jones and the parents of Rev. Mr. Jones. "W." tells us that Rev Mr. Jones "had a tendency to insanity in early life." Was it therefore he entered the church to instruct people in the way of salvation? "He was confined in a lunatic asylum for many months," and has, "during the last eighteen months often developed marked evidence of the same terrible malady." "W." is evidently determined to sacrifice Mr. Jones in the cause of religion. He next informs us that: "There has been no religious excitement connected with his parish for many months." Poor Mr. Jones is at present in the Lunatic Asylum at Stockton, and is consequently unable to answer "W.," who makes the above reckless statements with the sole purpose of depriving the "spiritualists" of the satisfaction of hearing of a clergyman's having lost his senses from religious excitement.

"The Wine of the Bible."

We have received a copy of a paper published in this city, entitled the Temperance Banner, which, among many other absurdities, contains an article "by a regular contributor," with the above caption. The "regular contributor" says:

"The proposition which we propose to establish is, that the wine which is not condemned directly by Holy Writ, is dissimilar to all other so-called wines, and bears no relationship to the fermented drinks of the nineteenth century.

"Ancient wines were very weak, and the separation of alcohol, was nuknown to the people who flourished before Christ. The strengthening of wines is solely a modern invention. The wines of the Bible are scarcely entitled to that name; indeed, the Sacred Word as frequently speaks of the 'juice of the grape,' as of wine. This juice was a food, not a heverage. It was held in a liquid state, and yet often solidified."

The Bible contains this passage: "Wine which maketh merry the heart of man;" therefore "the wines of the Bible" are "entitled to that name." The total abstinence cause will not be strengthened by such assertions as are made by the "regular contributor" of the Temperance Banner. To prove that "the wine of the Bible" was not simply the unfermented juice of the grape it is simply necessary to refer to righteous Noah who was probably one of the first wine makers—if not the first. Noah, as every reader of the Bible is aware, got horribly drunk on the wine which he made—so drunk in fact that not only did he take a long time to recover from his indulgence, but the effect was moreover to turn a large portion of his descendants black in the face. We do not think that Noah's wine could have been very much weaker than California wine.

Professor Gilliard on the "Bulletin."

We are led to believe that the public have been deceived by the statement which appeared in the daily press to the effect that Professor Gilliard, the crazy colored lecturer, was sent to Stockton Lunatic Asylum last week. We believe that he is at present in Sacramento engaged in writing letters to the Bulletin over the signature of "Moffat Weir." Whether or not we are right in this conjecture, we leave the public to judge from the following extract from "Moffat Weir's" (or Gilliard's) letter which appeared in Wednesday's Bulletin:

"Alice," the diminutive dramatic divinity, whom for seven weeks the Bay has crowned with lavish bays; who has so abundantly feathered her own cap and her manager's nest; who has fairly bowled out Maggie Mitchell at her own little game of "the Cricket;" Alice the petite; Alice the arch, the native, the cute; Alice, qualified with endless sprightly little adjectives, is with us. Her perchant is Fanchon. Her unbounded success is the result of her astounding naturalness and the astounding naturalness of the play dramatized from the occasionally naughty Sands's story of similar name. All hands are of the German agricultural persuasion but mangre that are immaculate in syntax, preserving with an enviable dexterity the fair fame of the nominative throughout the most complicated paragraphs, distributing adjectives with taste, adverbs with force, and pronouns which never go back on their progenitors in gender, number, person, or case."

We don't believe that any member of the Caucasian race penned the above; we don't believe that any snne darkey wrote it; it must have been Professor Gilliard.

Suffrage.

The working men of England are in a terrible state of agitation at present, and are determined, by fair means or foul, to gain their rights. John Bright has told them that each one of them is entitled to a vote, and they are determined to have it. John Stuart Mill is agitating the question of woman suffrage, and may perhaps gain for women the inestimable privilege of voting—some time hence. The following dispatch appears in the Bulletin of Thursday:

"WASHINGTON, December 12.—In the Senate, the Universal Suffrage bill for the District of Columbia being under consideration, Cowan's amendment striking out the word "male," as a qualification for voters, was defeated by 37 to 9."

Thirty seven to nine! The "niggers" will probably have votes before the women gain them in this country. A vote is a most valuable possession. The English working man would, as a rule, sell his vote for a five pound note, the negro would give his to his master and the woman would vote as the man she loved asked her to. However, the world moves.

High Art.

One of our solid dailies, a few days since, in the course of an unctuously enthusiastic description of the service of plate presented to Chief Burke, characterized said service as "a work of high art." We should like to know where the critical genuis who penned the paragraph classes painting and sculpture, and what are to be the "mechanic arts" under the new dispensation? If he had been discourseing about those urns at the top of Citizen Brannan's building, we should be able to see the point. No one can question that they are "high art."

A Happy Combination.

Piety and business were admirably combined by the Manager and Superintendent of a recent fair for the benefit of a Mission School connected with one of the city churches. On the backs of the tickets of admission to the Fair, the enterprising Superintendent printed his business card in full. This stroke of genius may suggest a new idea to the man who wants us to wear his shirts.

Horrible.

A young lady observed, yesterday, on being asked if she had seen the great picture painted by Nast: "No, I don't want to see it; Mr. Fitz Boodle, who paints pictures himself, has told me that both the coloring and drawing are very Nasty, and I don't like nasty things.

HOLIDAY BOOKS.—We have received from the house of A. Roman & Co. an elegantly illustrated edition of the famous Caudle Lectures, which comes to us wrapped in their "List of Holiday Books for Christmas and New Year, 1866-7. We observe that said list embraces Audubon's Birds of America—a folio volume with 150 colored plates representing the birds of the size of life, together with five volumes royal octavo, containing the text; also a large number of illustrated works of a less costly description. The list is especially rich in illustrated editions of popular poets.

FREE LECTURE ON EDUCATION.—We are requested to state that Mr. T. D. Adams, principal of an Eastern High School, and quite a prominent lecturer, now on a temporary visit to this State, will deliver a free lecture on Education at Lincoln Hall on Monday evening next.

OLD-FASHIONED SINS.

THE history of mankind may be traced by the sins which have gone out of fashion. One popular sin may have gone out with the use of wigs, but another has perhaps been introduced with cyliudrical hats; if so, it has brought its punishmeut along with it. It is likely that some passions are ultimately killed out by particular forms of society, as the instincts of a beast are altered by his domestication. The moral injunctions which were applicable in previous ages thus gradually acquire a curious tinge of naivete; they are directed against sins which have so changed in character that we have some difficulty in discovering their modern representatives. In other cases, we have merely changed our mode of action. We have learnt to convey, and not to steal; to break a wife's heart by refined spiritual torture, instead of knocking her down with a club and stamping upon her; to influence by delicate attentious, instead of practising coarse bribery; and so forth. But there are also some sins for which we seem to have grown too sensible or too virtuous.

For example, old-fashioned moralists are always talking about the wickedness of revenge. People seem really to have taken an exqnisite pleasure in revenging themselves; they are warned against yielding to its temptations as the toper of the present day is warned against drinkiug gin. It is supposed to be undoubtedly wrong, but so pleasant that it requires almost superhuman strength to refrain from it. Now what civilized being at the present day really thinks it worth while to take any trouble to revenge himself? If any one has injured his vanity, has treated him in public places with contempt, or exposed his folly, he is rather glad than otherwise to pay off his adversary when the occasion comes; but to make vengeance any very serious object of thought, much more to devote a life to it after the melodramatic fashion, is so rare as to be almost an evidence of insanity. In old days, the case would naturally be different. A feudal baron, in the inteuse dullness of his country life, would very likely have nothing else to think of than the injury done to him by some brutal likeness of himself; the one great excitement of his life being a fight, he would be always employing his imagination at odd times in taking his enemy at a disadvantage, getting him down, and casting him into a loathsome dungeon. He might brood over this for hours, when his modern counterpart would be reading the morning papers. It would doubtless be extremely gratifying when he could ultimately change these amiable fancies into facts, and get his enemy bodily into the loathsome duugeon before his eyes. It would be a real addition to his narrow round of amusements to gloat over his unlucky victim in the dungeon, to ask him how he liked mouldy bread and stinking water, and perhaps ultimately to put his eyes out, or starve him, after the playful custom of the period. Loathsome dungeons have, however, gone out of fashion. If a country gentleman were to get another into his power, and lock him up in the coal-cellar, there would be a row about it in the papers; he therefore gives up meditating such an action as a part of real life; he does not even anticipate very seriously that he will ever be able to knock his enemy's head off, though he sometimes uses some such traditional form of words as roughly expressing his feelings. As distractions are more plentiful than they used to be—even in the country—it is much easier to forget all about his injury, thus combining obedieuce to Christian morality with amusement.

Revenge is still known, indeed, and is exemplified by occasional murderers, and eccentric old bachelors and ladies; but in the classes whose time is fully occupied it has gone pretty well out of fashion; the pleasure is not worth the trouble. It is still believed in by novelists, because it is very convenient for dramatic purposes, and because nine-tenths of novelists draw, not from life, but from their predecessors. But even novelists are beginning to find it very hard to introduce it with any probability. Duelling is gone out of fashion, and murder is not common in good society. The way in which the heroes of most novels revenge themselves is by one of those elaborate and diabolical plots which have, so far as we have ever heard, absolutely no counterpart in real life. People sometimes tell a good many lies to get up the shares of a railway company, or to send down a horse in the betting; but the plot of fiction—the elaborate arrangement in which the villain brings the virtuous characters under the influence of a diabolical enchantment, causing everybody to misunderstand everybody else throughout two volumes and a half—is simply fictitious. No one has time enough to weave such tangled webs of deceit. The villain has to be at his chambers or on the Stock Exchange, and cannot be bothered with acting Iago in common life; he would much rather give up the lady and the revenge, and take it out in money. In short, it is getting daily more difficult to injure our enemies satisfactorily, and we have daily a greater number of causes of distraction. It is not yet easy to love our enemies, but it is remarkably easy not to hate them. In fact, very few men have got any enemies in the proper sense of the word. There are many men for whom one feels an instinctive dislike, but the worst that the most spiteful of us can do is to avoid their company, and perhaps to speak ill of them behind their backs. And nobody is seriously the worse nowadays for a little backbiting. The world won't trouble itself about trifles, and such hostility is at most like throwing a few shells into a fortified town. It is annoying, but does no vital injury

There are various other vices which tend to become obsolete on the same principle. Why used our fathers, fifty years ago, to consume two bottles of port after dinner? Simply because life was so dull that they had nothing better to do. The dreary old bacchanalian melodies about driving away care merely meant that an elderly gentleman of the period was generally bored unless he was drunk. No man could now afford to dine early every day, and pass the evening boozing, even if it were intrinsically pleasant. A somewhat similar case is that of gambling, considered as distinct from speculation. People enjoy games of pure chance because it is the simplest possible way of obtaining excitement without even an intellectual effort. Savages are keen gamblers, when they have a chance; it is a pleasant relief to the torpor of their ordinary lives at home. Red Indians, after losing all their other property, will stake their scalps, their lives, or their liberties. In more civilized states of society a craving for excitement will induce men to gamble in proportion to their indolence and recklessness. Some of the old savage spirit is therefore still kept alive. The heavy gambling of the last century has rather gone out of fashion, because the class amongst whom it flourished is on the whole better employed.

The Turf still gives opportunities for sheer gambling, of which plenty of persons are ready to take advantage; which proves that there is still a large class of people with too little mind to appreciate any intellectual source of excitement, with too little serious occupation to preserve them from dulness, with too little forethought to appreciate the real value of their prospects, and with too much money to be good for them. The first three qualities make them approximate to the Red Indian as closely as other differences permit, and they take the best way for removing the distinction founded upon the quality. The Turf is of course an improvement intellectually upon games of pure chance, in so far as the gamblers generally expect to win by superior knowledge or skill. Whether this is a moral advantage is a very different question. In the same way, gambling on the Stock Exchange of course involves intellect—especially if that name includes every variety of cunning. We should therefore say that the old vice of gambling tends to go out of fashion and to be superseded by the more refined vice—or perhaps we should call it virtue—in which intellect has a share as well as a chance.

The general tendency of these changes, as of so many others, is to what is called the softening of modern life—the extirpation of the gross, brutal vices of former ages; and, in cases where they subsist in other forms, the substitution of more refined and indirect modes of gratifying the passion. Possibly the passion which is in some cases gradually starved out by this treatment is in others stimulated. If envy, hatred, and malice are on the whole declining, certainly picking and stealing do not seem to fall off. The modes by which property may be made to change hands are so various, and have been elaborated with such marvellous ingenuity, that the old language of theft is becoming inadequate. Railway and mining companies have quite distanced pickpockets. But, it is only fair to add, this kind of cheating can only grow in proportion to the growth of confidence, so that perhaps it is a good sign on the whole.—Saturday Review.

BOHEMIANISM.

THERE are two fictitious localities which it must be pleasant to inhabit; for people, it would seem, the least imaginative in the world are only too happy to build their castles in Spain, while some of their neighbors determine to live their lives in Bohemia. Now Bohemia, ever since Shakspeare placed a seaport on its land-locked boundaries, has been a privileged territory. Why it should be so, it is difficult to say, for we might as well have called these erratic persons who live in Bohemia, Italians, Ishmaelites, Cochin-Chinese, or Fijians; but no, nothing but the word Bohemian will suffice them; and hence, a sufficiently reputable term is detailed to serve an unworthy purpose.

As with many of their so-called works, these gentlemen took their name from the French. A pleasant author has given a sketch of the "Vie de Boheme," and the phrase has crept into the dictionaries as something very disreputable. "Vivre comme un Bohemien" is to be "un individu qui vit sans souci du monde," an outsider, a Pistol, Nym, and Bobadil rolled into one. Our wild young fellows who seek to open the world, not, like mine ancient Pistol, with their sword, but with a steel pen, or the paint brush and mahl-stick, are delighted to be classed with the order, and are in ecstacies if they persuade the world that they owe an immense deal of money, have never paid their-landlady or restaurant, and have reduced more than one tailor to bankruptcy. "I have," Robert Brough says, "lived and suffered in Bohemia, and I thank Heaven have escaped from it so long, that I can speak of its miseries without undue bitterness, and of its joys without partial fondness." He goes on to tell us that Bohemia Proper is called Petræa, or the Stony; and that there is no Bohemia Felix, and that it is "a kind of back-slum suburb to the cities of literature and art." And then anticipating Mr. Bright's famous mot, for he wrote in 1857, he adds, "it is a stronghold of rebels, whereunto, as to the Cave of Adullam, resort all such inhabitants of those regions as are in distress, every one that is in debt, and every one that is discontented with the edicts of King Saul—society."

These Bohemians were supposed by the too partial pen who wrote those words, to be men of genius, with a tendency to get drunk; and we have a picture of a universal linguist, a sage politician, a poet gloriously endowed, and an artist to whom Turner, even magnified by Ruskin's glass, is but a dwarf. These, we are told, being finely wrought, regard what they earn by the exercise of their genius "with loathing, and the money it brings as the wages of sin." Such money is quickly wasted and spent like all ill-gotten gains. Why the poor fellows should be so mad as to look at the drib'ets brought in by the exercise of "god-gifted genius" as the wages of sin, no one but themselves can say. Dryden remarked of Lee, that "there was a pleasure in being mad that none but madmen know," and no doubt he spoke truly. So of Bohemian madness, that has its occult pleasures, undiscernible to ordinary eyes. As to the melting of the money, that is true enough; it melts in pots of beer and goes of gin, large lumps of gold and silver being easily soluble in such liquids; and as to the politicians, linguists, and poets, ten years' incubation of a whole club-full of Bohemians has not been able to hatch a single genius out of the lot of eggs they have selected.

The Bohemian is desperately convival. He is even more so than the festive peasants in operas, who drink with much spirit frequent libations from tinfoil and pasteboard goblets. The Bohemian rejoices in club life, and in naming these he has shown his usual caprice. Dr. Johnson was content to call his club "The Literary Club," and the chief set of respectable actors and authors in London appropriately call their club "The Garrick." Our Bohemians must name theirs after one of the most disreputable, shameless, and drunken shams of men that ever lived; who owes the only good lines in his poems to Pope, whom he traduced, and his reputation to a man whom he sneered at and despised, and whose sterling character he never could have appreciated. The members of this club call themselves "savages;" but beyond smoking pipes they appear to have little in common with the Red Indians. Another set names itself "The Vagrants," and delights in a wild song concocted by the Dick Swiveller of the occasion, in which each gentleman, looming ruddily over his pipe, shouts, in ecstatic chorus, "I'm a vagrant, thou'rt a vagrant, vagrunts too are he and she." As "a bear was meat and drink" to Master Slender, so this body of men prides itself on being considered outcast and vagabond.

A little learning is a dangerous thing, and a little attachment to art or literature seems to produce the abnormal state which is described as Bohemianism. When afflicted with this disease, the victim, like the Marchioness who soaked orange-peel in water and called it lemonade, "makes believe very much," and fancies that he hates all the world, that respectability is a ghoul, and money perfectly useless; he lets his beard be unshaven and his hands dirty; he has a mania for queer hats, and thinks that he is no man unless he can boast of being annoyed by duns; he believes that reputations are made per saltum "by genius, sir," and that hard work has nothing to do with the matter; he generously devotes himself to unsuccessful men, and praises the pictures of Pipps as marvels of art, prizing them above those of Raffaelle; when, however, Pipps sells his works and emerges into work and respectability, he is "a humbug, sir; a wind-bag." The Bohemian is great in beer and blasphemy, and he delights in profane stories without point, washed in pale ale from the pewter; he is doubtful about the past great men, and denounces Shakspeare either as a myth or an overrated man. He always is finding out a "new poet" who quickly subsides. Dr. Johnson is a "muff," and Lord Bacon a fool; of the wider demain of literature he has seen little, quotes the good things of Sydney Smith as said by Douglas Jerrold, and plainly tells you that "little Brown" is a far better actor than Garrick, and yells in affected agony if he be recommended to see a legitimate play.

To sober men who look at things from a different standpoint, all this is very silly and contemptible. It has an injurious effect upon literature and art, since professors of those noble callings are often looked upon as mere jack-puddings, or even swindlers, because of the distorted representations of their friends of Bohemia. That some good men may enter now and then this enchanted land, and be even enchanted by the easy manners of the inhabitants, is true enough; if they be sound as well as good, they quickly extricate themselves, and, so far from scandalizing a profession which—be it in letters or pictorial art—requires all the energy, devotion, and even patient plodding of the best intellects set to work to attain a respectable position in a calling which, of all others, requires purity of life and purpose.—London Review.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation be asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

Some "Recollections of Charles Lamb" are published in the last number of Notes and Queries. The writer, in his youthful days, knew Lamb at Enfield and Edmonton. He dates from Brussels, and signs his communication "T. W." Most readers will perhaps be surprised to hear that "Alice W—was not Lamb's sole passion," It appears that, at a much later period of his life, he was again smitten; but, says, "T. W.," discreetly, "as the lady who inspired this affection may still be living, it were premature to speak of it in detail." Among other statements in the letter is one to the effect that Lamb used to have the bindings of his old books mended by a cobbler when they became too bad to hold together. His new books—even the works of his familiar friends—he would give away, often throwing them over the garden wall into the premises of "T. W.," who lived next door. The young writer was frequently invited into the cottage of the Lambs, to spend the evening with the famous ones of those days. "Of the discourse of these dii majores," he writes, "I have no recollection now; but the faces of some of them I can still partially recall. Hazlitt's for instance, keen and aggressive, with eyes that flashed out epigram. Tom Hood's a methodist parson's face: not a ripple breaking the line of it, though every word he dropped was a pun, and every pun roused a roar of laughter. Leigh Hunt's, parcel genial, parcel democratic, with as much rabid polities on his lips as honey from Mount Hybla. Miss Kelly's plain, but engaging. (The most unprofessional of actresses, and unspoiled of women: the bloom of the child on her cheek, undefaced by the rouge, to speak in a metaphor.) She was one of the most dearly welcome of Lamb's guests. Wordsworth, farmerish and respectable, but with something of the great poet occasionally breaking out, and glorifying forehead and eyes. Then there was Martin Burney, ugliest of men, hugest of eaters, honestest of friends. I see him closeted with Mary Lamb, reading the Gospel of St. John for the first time. And Sheridan Knowles, burly and jovial, striding into Lamb's breakfast room one spring morning,—a great bunch of May-blossom in his hand. And George Darley, scholar and poet,—slow of speech and gentle of strain: Miss Kelly's constant shadow in her walks amongst the Enfield woodlands."

The island recently thrown up on the Florida coast, by volcanic action has been explored, and consists mainly of quicksand, dangerous to travel on except in one small portion, which is of a rocky nature, Some signs of vegetation are already apparent, some rank grasses and plants having already started.

Govern the Passions.—Hatred, envy, malice, jealousy, and covetousness, are venemous serpents, which bite like the adder. The man or woman who harbors them, in time becomes a miserable creature; for these serpants will swell and expand until there is no resting-place for love, joy, and peace.

A FAST STORY.

An ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman, "they have to commence ringing about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound: the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-grown head of hair and teeth in their mouths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', also, Mechanical Toys, that run by themselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"Indeed! is that so? Who is the firm that have the Dolls saying 'Mamma'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasing? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

THE GREEN CAP.

THERE once lived in St. Petersburg an aged man, who, though poor, had always been noted for strict honor and integrity, and whose whole course of life was regular as clock-work. Every morning he left his modest dwelling at precisely the same hour, passed through old-clothes market to his Bureau, and, after six hours' labor was accomplished, returned by the self-same route. His garments were shabby from long service, and the covering on his cap was worn to shreds. The urgent solicitations of his daughters finally induced him to replace the latter article; and seeing some of green color one day in a shop window, he went in and inquired the price. The shopman, however, refused to sell them, on the plea that they were already bespoke, and offered to show him others of a different hue; but the old man had set his heart on green.

"Well, then," said the man, "if you must absolutely have it, take it, and if needs must I can finish another by to morrow to take its place."

The bargain was accordingly concluded, and the next day no small excitement was created by the appearance of the cap, which elicited from his colleagues smiling congratulations upon his successful purchase.

Two days afterward, the heat being intense in the Bureau, he felt in his pocket for his handkerchief, in order to wipe the perspiration from his face, and he drew forth, to his great astonishment, one of fine India foulard silk. He showed it to his colleagues, and inquired if he had not by mistake appropriated another person's property; but one and all disclaimed all knowledge of it, and agreed unanimously that it must be a surprise from one of his daguhters.

"Children," said he, upon his return to his house, "who has done this? Do you wish to make me vain in my old age?"

His daughters also declared their ignorance of the matter, and, after many random guesses, finally made up their minds that it must have been put in his pocket by their cousin, who spent last Sunday with them; and the handkerchief was carefully put aside by their father.

On the following day, as he was carefully spreading his coat tails in order to seat himself at the desk, he felt something hard in both his pockets, and putting in his hand, brought from one a gold watch and from the other a well-furnished purse. This time his reason was overwhelmed; but after long reflection he formed a sudden resolution. He had been more punctual than the other officials, and was alone in the room; he therefore determined to say nothing to them of his discovery, and as the office hours were over, he went directly to the chief of the police and solicited a private audience. He then produced the watch and purse, and related the history of the handkerchief. After the chief had fully possessed himself of all the particulars, he said:

"It is very singular! Has nothing of the kind ever happened to you before?"

"Never before last week."

"Have you made any change in your dress within that time?"

"No."

"Recollect!"

"Oh, yes, certainly! I bought a new cap!"

"Tell me how and where you bought it."

The old man told him everything connected with his purchase, upon which the chief laughed heartily, and exclaimed:

"Poor, honest man that you are, you have become a member of a band of thieves! Do you not perceive?" The twenty caps of the same shape and color were to serve them as a mark for recognition; and as every pickpocket seeks to divest himself as quickly as possible of his stolen goods, they have taken you for an accomplice, and transferred these articles to your pocket. We are greatly indebted to accident and to you. Take this money and buy another cap from one of the principal magazines: then bring this one back immediately; for as I hope to have the whole gang in my power to-morrow, you must not run the risk of being arrested also."

The old man went into a shop and purchased another covering for his head; but as he was about to tie up the cap in his handkerchief, in order to take it back to the police-office, he found in the crown, to his no small surprise, a costly piece of lace. He hastened to deliver this fresh booty into the hands of the chief, who again burst into a peal of laughter when he beheld the despairing countenance of the honest thief.

The necessary measures were immediately taken. Two dozen detectives were made acquainted with the form of the cap; and simultaneously, at precisely the same hour, every possessor of the sign was placed in durance vile.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND
IN USE
THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING
Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,
FOR WOOD OR COAL.
IMPROVED IN 1861;
WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.
2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.
3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.
4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.
5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.
6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.
7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.
9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.
10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.
See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

THE HAIR-DRESSER'S DAUGHTER.

"Know then, sir," the maiden began, drawing a deep sigh, "that I am cursed with a luxuriant head of hair, whose color is that of the setting sun."

"Some," I muttered, "would call it blessed to be thus endowed. It is the fashionable color."

"Worse luck," said the maiden, in tones of despair. "That accursed tint is the cause of my persecution. My paternally kind but professionally cruel father has woke me in the dead of night and seized me by this golden hair—"

"To beat you, maiden?"

"Nay, sir, to dress my head a la something, a new form of coiffure which has arrived from Paris while I slept. When I have been coming to the most deeply interesting part of a novel, he has rushed into the room and insisted on my trying on a chignon. He takes me from my tea to practice the double roll upon me. When I am ready dressed to go to the play he pulls my hair down to try a new form of bandeau. At all hours of the day and night I am liable to be curled, and frizzed, and plaited, and powdered. In sickness and in health, in joy and in sorrow, I must yield my head to his ruthless but skillful hands. I know no rest. For months I have slept with my eyes open."

"With your eyes open, maiden?"

"With my eyes open. It was the consequence of having my hair done a l' Imperatrice. It was pulled back so tightly that I could not shut them. It was not until the neglige friz came up that the muscles relaxed. Ah, sir, you know not what I have suffered—what I have sacrificed!"

An awkward, ill-dressed countryman who was strolling about the Park the other day, attracted considerable attention, on account of his absurd appearance. Becoming at last conscious of the fact, he turned to a gentleman who was looking at him with open-mouthed surprise, and exclaimed, "Halloo, if you keep your mouth so wide open you'll sunburn your teeth," and walked away triumphant amid the laughter his sally called forth.

Looming in the Distance.—An American paper states that every lady who has been at Mount Holyoke seminary is expected to write an annual letter stating whether she is married or single, how many children she has, and other particulars concerning status and progress. A young lady of the class of 1861 has just written to the class secretary that she is not married, but that she thinks she can see—to quote from the scripture—a little cloud that arises out of the sky of the future like a man's hand.

In a little town on the Ohio, a lady was examining a class of juveniles in mental arithmetic. She commenced the question,—

"If you buy a cow for ten dollars"—

When up came a little hand.

"What is it, Johnny?"

"Why you can't buy no kind of a cow for ten dollars; father sold one for sixty dollars the other day, and she was a regular old scrub at that."

"Every thing French is more elegant than that of any other nation," says a Parisian enthusiastic chronicler. "Even the crocodile brought from our possessions in Cochin China to the Jardin des Plantes is more elegant than the horrid beast of a crocodile brought from the shores of the Nile." As a bit of self-complacency that will do.

Diamonds.—A remarkable-looking person astonished the habitues of the Italian Opera, in Paris, the other evening. He had on a cravat completely covered with diamonds. The nobby gentleman, as might be expected, turned out not to be of the upper ten, but a keeper of a cafe.

To think correctly, and express one's self to the best advantage to a reader or hearer, is a higher and more difficult art than that of the painter, statuary or musician. The prejudices of others do not offer so great an obstacle to these latter, as to the orator and writer.

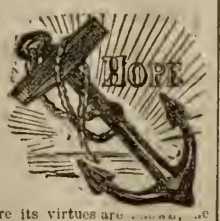
AYER'S

CHERRY PECTORAL,

FOR THE RAPID CURE OF

COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA, HOARSENESS, CROUP, BRONCHITIS, INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION, AND FOR THE RELIEF OF CONSUMPTIVE PATIENTS IN ADVANCED STAGES OF THE DISEASE.



So wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous are the cases of its cures, that almost every section of country abounds in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other Expectorant is too apparent to escape observation and where its virtues are [illegible] the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs that are incident to our climate. While many inferior remedies thrust upon the community have failed and been discarded, this having gained friends by every trial, conferred benefits on the afflicted they can never forget, and produced cures too numerous and too remarkable to be forgotten.

We can only assure the public, that its quality is carefully kept up to the best it ever has been, and that it may be relied on to do for their relief all that it has ever done.

Great numbers of clergymen, Physicians, Statesmen, and eminent personages, have lent their names to certify the unparalleled usefulness of our remedies, but space here will not permit the insertion of them. The Agents below named furnish gratis our American Almanac in which they are given; with also full descriptions of the complaints they cure.

Those who require an alterative medicine to purify the blood will find Ayer's Compound Extract Sarsaparilla the remedy to use. Try it once, and you will know its value

The People of the State of California send greeting to LOUIS M. PRINCE, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Hon. Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and awarding to Plaintiff the sole custody of Louis Prince, the child of said parties, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said Plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

DANIEL O'NEIL, Plaintiff, vs. JOHN CHAPMAN ET AL, Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, and the complaint filed in the City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN CHAPMAN, M. LAUFENBERGER, and MARGARET BAUSCH, Defendants.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, a copy of which accompanies this summons, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this Judicial district, within twenty days; or if served out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage, described in the complaint, and executed by the said John Chapman on the first day of May, A. D. 1866, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note of even date therewith, made and executed by the said Defendant Chapman, whereby he promised to pay to the Plaintiff the sum of two thousand dollars in gold coin of the United States, three years from the date of the said note, with interest thereon at the rate of one per cent. per month, payable quarterly in gold coin, that is to say, at the end of every three months; and in case default be made in the payment of the said interest, or any part thereof, when the same becomes due, then the whole of the said principal and interest shall be due; that the premises conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment, in United States gold coin, of said sum of $2,000, with interest thereon according to the terms of said note, and the costs of suit; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said John Chapman for the balance remaining due, and also that the said Defendant, and all persons claiming by, through or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right, title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest in and to said mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.

And if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the Plaintiff will take default against you, and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District, this second day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand, eight hundred and sixty-six. WM. LOEWY, Clerk

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me" A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I WILL aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

A Change of Base.

IN consequence of the dropsical notions of "dignity" entertained by the heavy editor of this paper, who furnishes prosy disquisitions on politics, philosophy, and religion for the "leading" columns, and who desires a larger amount of space in which to expatiate, the "Lion's Moath," has been transferred to the first page of THE CALIFORNIAN, in spite of our most earnest remonstrance. Nevertheless we have the satisfaction of knowing that our department has ten readers to his one, and we suspect that the real motive of our ejectment from the honors of the ninth page, is to be found in the natural desire of the heavy editor to avoid damaging comparisons between the sprightliness of our department, and the owlish dullness of his, by adopting an arrangement which will prevent the two from confrontiag each other from contiguous pages.

A First Class-Journal.

A great many persons unkindly sneer at the Times. They say that they expected it to be "a first-class journal," and that they now find its editorials, local items, and dramatic criticisms, all of the cheapest and lowest class. These strictures on the Times are, in a measure, just, but still they are unkind. The Times is, it must be remembered, a young paper at present—scarce out of its puppyhood—it will get its eyes more fully opened by and by. The dramatic criticisms of the Times are rather funny, we must confess, but then we may hope that they will become better as the paper grows older. In Wednesday's issue the following funny things appear:

"This evening a new and novel entertainment will take place at Platt's Hall, being nothing more nor less than a grand musical and floral festival, illustrative of the seasons, for the benefit of the Pacific Bible Home and Mariner's Church."

Until the Times, a first-class paper, convinced us of our mistake, we labored under the impression that "new" and "novel" were synonyms. In the notice of the Ladies Floral Festival, in the same issue, we are told:

"If the weather is favorable, they could but have a crowded house to-night."

We should say that a crowded house was, indeed, all that the ladies could have or desire to have. They "could but have" a crowded house.

In the notice of the Metropolitan Theatre, in the same issue of this first-class paper, we are told that:

"The ballet of The Baquet, arranged by Mdme. Desire Mathieu, displays to great advantage the saltatory abilities of the whole troupe."

Here we must join in the protest of the public in general against the Times being considered a first class San Francisco journal. Even Webster's dictionary will not authorize such barbarous spelling. Better by far call the ballet referred to, the Bucket than the Bo-quet.

We intended to defend the Times, but really, on casting our eye over the copy which has happened to come under our notice, we consider that if it claims to be a "first class journal," as regards every department, the kindest thing which we can do, is to refrain from criticising it.

An Explanation.

At the last meeting of the Board of Supervisors, when the Mayor's message concerning lager beer saloons was received, Mr. Tittel begged leave to explain his remarks made at the last meeting of the Board, "for an erroneous impression had obtained amongst some persons, owing to the report in the Alta. That journal stated that he had visited some fifty places where the game of poker was carried on. He did so, but why? He was laboring in an excited political canvass, and on behalf of one of the purest and best officers that ever Sun Francisco had (Judge Cowles). He visited saloons where he was acquainted in order to benefit his friend, for whose success he felt anxious."

As Supervisor only visited saloons "where he was acquainted," and did not take a hand at poker while he was "laboring in an excited political canvass," his explanation must be accepted as satisfactory. We should, however, certainly reprobate a Supervisor's playing poker in a saloon where he was not acquainted, particularly during election time unless he did so for the purpose of making political points.

The San Francisco Olympic Club and the Press.

We acknowledge the receipt of an invitation from the S. F. O. C., tendered to us conjointly with the other members of the Press, to partake of the privileges of their rooms. We think the club has taken a lamentably false step in this movement. How are all the uncongenial spirits of the editorial corps to meet and mingle together under one roof? Do the Olympians labor under the mistaken idea that they possess sufficient influence and social power to reconcile antagonisms so fierce as will here meet?

Why, from this hour forward the Club is seated, as it were, over a living volcano that may at any moment explode, and scatter its harmony to the winds. How impossible it will be to keep editorial cliques from forming. The friends of the Alta and the Bulletin, for instance, will back them to outlift the Times on that great modern dead weight—the telegraphic news; while the combative little Examiner will be sure to rush in and seize on the Times' coat-tail to aid in the pull; when at once there will be a rush, and the cry of "foul!" from the Alta clique. Here will be cause for a row very naturally. Or, the Alta may want to take the swing away from the Times on the plea of respectable age, and proceed to rehearse its well known biography, amidst the cries of "dry up" from some rival editor. Or imagine a friendly set-to (such as they have frequently in their columns,) with the gloves on, between the editors of the Times and the Bulletin—with the Call sitting astride a swinging-bar as umpire.

Is it to be supposed for a minute that any considerations of courtesy could restrain them when they got their blood warmed from "pitching in" in earnest. Most certainly not! Why, the oldest and coolest members of the P. R. frequently loose their self-command in such cases; and it is not to be supposed that these novices in the art could restrain the exuberance of their hot blood.

Then again, there would be danger of self-exhaustion and prostration from rivalry in the dumb-bell exercise. The Alta and Bulletin would keep "paying out," and "paying out" the strength of their system, to force the Times to attempt equal feats of strength, thinking thus the sooner to exhaust their younger competitor, until all three of them would have to be laid upon a couch of double sheets and supplements of ill-selected and indigestable reading, and have restoratives applied by their friends to resuscitate them.

Doubtless these invitations were tendered by the Olympic Club to the Press in the most kindly spirit of muscular Christianity. But it is sad to think what evils may arise from them.

Symptoms of Sanity.

Professor Gilliard, the colored lecturer and journalist, who we are sure is, as we observed last week, writing letters to the Bulletin over the signature of "Moffat Weir," is recovering his senses. How much the mild rebuke which we administered last week, has had to do with effecting this desirable result, we cannot say, but it is certainly a fact that Professor Gilliard or "Moffat Weir," the Sacramento correspondent of the Bulletin, shows symptoms of returning sanity. Last week he lavished on Miss Alice Kingsbury all the phrases which an insane negro in a state of frenzied excitement could call to mind. This week he says, simply:

"Kingsbury played here two weeks and went to Marysville yesterday, without having worn out her welcome. She will go thence to Grass Valley, Nevada, etc., and return for a brief season here on her way to the bay. She had an excellent benefit while here."

Last week Miss Alice Kingsbury was:

"'Alice,' the diminutive dramatic divinity, whom for seven weeks the Bay has crowned with lavish bays; who has so abundantly feathered her own cap and her manager's nest; who has fairly bowled out Maggie Mitchell at her own little game of 'the Cricket;' Alice the petite; Alice the arch, the native, the cute; Alice, qualified with endless sprightly little adjectives."

Now she is "Kingsbury!" We are afraid that Professor Gilliard—or "Moffat Weir"—must have been snubbed by Miss Alice Kingsbury, who may be supposed to have no penchant for crazy negroes. However, by whatever means the desirable end was accomplished, we are glad that "Moffat Weir—or Professor Gilliard—the Sacramento correspondent of the Bulletin, has shown symptoms of returning sanity.

Our Best Society.

A magnificent entertainment for the holidays for the ladies and gentlemen of San Francisco has been prepared by "the ladies and gentlemen of the Martinetti-Ravel Troupe." A Mask Ball is to be given under the direction of these members of our best society on Friday evening, December 28th, at the Metropolitan Theatre. In the advertisement the following announcements are made:

"Ladies' admission tickets will be indorsed with each lady's name, and will not be transferable under any circumstances.

"In announcing the above, the Messrs. Martinetti assure the public that every exertion will be made on their part to produce an entertainment in every respect worthy of the citizens of San Francisco."

We thus have the assurance of the Martinetti Troupe that this masked ball will be worthy of San Francisco. In addition to this we have another assurance: Professor Johnson, who has given so many masked balls in this city, which, if they have not been patronized by our best society, have been pecuniarily as successful as those of late given by Mons. Leon et al, is at present one of the gentlemen of the Martinetti-Ravel Troupe, and will, no doubt, give valuable aid in procuring the attendance of lady dancers who have heretofore patronized his mask balls. The Bulletin thus indorses this proposed ball as being quite the thing:

"It is intended to be not only a grand but select affair, and will be attended only by the better class of people."

Under these circumstances this grand and select affair will certainly be patronized by our best society, and even Bishop Kip himself, much as he may object to balls being given for the benefit of the Church, could not offer any opposition to these harmless and high-class Christmas festivities.

Calling Names.

The lower classes who have not devoted their early years to the study of rhetorics, when they become engaged in a wordy quarrel, strive to choose high sounding epithets to apply to their adversaries—which shall so overwhelm them that they will be incapable of reply. Doctor Johnson is reported to have utterly extinguished a Billingsgate fish-fag who called him a ——, and a ——, and a ——, by retorting—"Madam, you are an impersonal pronoun and an irregular verb."

Any one can call names. The Flag could call names. It said this week:

"Tennyson, the English Court rhymester, has brought himself into disrepute by defending Governor Eyre, the West India assassin."

It is not wise in the Flag to term Tennyson "the English Court rhymester;" it is not wise in the Flag to speak of ex-Governor Eyre as "the West India assassin." This style of abuse is, however, the easiest. "Your another" is a phrase constantly on the lips of those who render themselves liable to abusive language. The science of calling names is understood by few. Many say "Smith" is a dog" without reflecting how much honor they do this Smith whom they wish to hold up to public reprobation, by calling him "a dog." They intend to convey the idea that Smith is dishonest—but a dog is always honest, that Smith has deceived them—but a dog has no deceit in his nature. This Smith, who is termed "a dog," might probably, after being supported by the individual who so characterizes him for many months, pick the aforesaid individual's pocket; or might, in the event of the individual's funds becoming exhausted, leave this individual now impecunious, and attach himself to another individual. The "dog" would not act in this manner.

Statements have appeared in many papers congratulating the country on the fact that the colored people of the South are acquiring habits of industry and economy. We are told that they now save their earnings instead of spending them on dress and amusement. The Sacramento Bee was active in collecting and reproducing in its columns statements of this kind, which might serve to prove that the colored race would, instead of being a burden on the country, very shortly become large property holders as well as producers. Under these circumstances, when the Bee found a statement to the effect that the colored people's savings bank, in Mobile, failed in consequence of the darkies who had deposited their savings in it, suddenly withdrawing them for the purpose of going on a spree, it is not strange that it should dishonestly strike out the word "colored" and publish the paragraph thus:

"A Mobile savings bank collapsed the other day because the depositors withdrew the funds to attend a circus. So says an exchange.'

The Aristocratic "Call."

We are afraid that the Call is becoming aristocratic in its ideas. It evidently does not favor the views of John Bright with regard to universal suffrage. It makes out a strong case against granting all Englishmen the right of voting in the following paragraph which it published on Wednesday:

"The last mail from Europe brings as an account of a 'most interesting match' between two butchers, a 'Mr. Roberts, of Leeds,' and a "Mr. Woods, of Beverley," as to which of the two could kill and dress for the market the largest number of sheep in the shortest space of time. Five thousand intelligent Britons, candidates no doubt, under the favor of John Bright, for the privilege of the suffrage, left their homes and business to see the successful 'Mr. Roberts, of Leeds,' triumphantly slaughter 'twenty sheep in 95 minutes and 58 seconds.' 'Mr. Roberts, of Leeds,' took his money, and the slaughtered sheep, we hope, were duly cooked and eaten by the enlightened spectators."

The Call is very indiscreet to allow its aristocratic tendencies to lead it to sneer at butchers just at this season of the year. It will certainly loose some of its "Christmas meat" advertisements.

Highly Flattering."

The dramatic critic of the Alta evidently entertains a high opinion of Lady Don. In yesterday's issue, after lamenting that the stormy weather prevented a large attendance at the Opera Houses, he says:

"To-night, we hope, clear skies, a beaming moon, and a host of diamond eyes, will flash with delight at the raising of the curtain."

To expect clear skies and a beaming moon to "flash with delight at the raising of the curtain" at the Opera House, is rather extravagant, even when Lady Don is the attraction.

Late in the Day.

Another professor of "Laying on of Hands" has arrived in town. We imagine that Spiritual healing by laying on of hands has had its day. Chinese doctors were the rage for about six weeks. The new professor will find that the harvest has been gathered by his predecessor and will have to be content with the few scattered ears (long ears) which yet remain to be taken in.

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES.

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, an only son and spendthrift, walks down from Loudon to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and forty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amherst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post-mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London. In London, at the house of Stewart Routh, a gentlemanly gambler and adventurer of good accomplishments and address, the reader is introduced to his wife Harriet, commonly addressed by Routh as "Harry,"—a woman of rare mental qualifications and quick appreciation, thoroughly devoted to her husband, his counselor in all his schemes, and a most efficient aid in his precarious mode of living.

One Deane, an American, a cool, sharp, "posted" man, with abundant means, is also introduced, whose cleverness is even too much for the designs of Routh and his wife. George Dallas receives a letter from his mother, who writes him that the one hundred and forty pounds, obtained by a great risk and almost criminal sacrifice, will be given to him by her in person at Amherst. He informs Routh of the import of his mother's letter. Routh, meanwhile, is organizing a company for working some newly discovered silver mines in Brazil, which promises to be "a big thing," but is badly in want of funds to successfully launch his scheme; when he learns from Deane that he is to receive for some stock transaction three thousand pounds, which sum Deane proposes to keep in his desk for a few days until wanted; and, in celebration of the event, he invites Routh and Dallas to dine with him at a fashionable restaurant on the same evening. Routh tells his wife that he must have Deane's money "one way or another." The dinner comes off, but Routh is not present.

George Dallas again visits Amherst under his author-name of "Paul Ward," to receive from his mother the money she promised him; when he learns from her lips that she has secretly sent her diamonds to Paris to be imitated, with the object of pledging the genuine ones as the only available means of obtaining the amount. The jewelry failing to arrive, his mother requests him to stop at Amherst for a few days to await its arrival. While sketching a private park, "The Sycamores," a chance acquaintance is brought about—which rapidly ripens into mutual though unavowed feelings of affection between Miss Clare Carruthers, a beautiful young lady of nineteen, the favorite niece and heir of the rich Capel Carruthers—Dallas' father-in-law—and our hero; known only to Miss Carruthers as "Paul Ward," the author. After receiving the bracelet from his mother, George Dallas returns to London, arriving late in the evening. He but called at the Mercury office, where he overhears some conversation about a recent murder, and immediately goes to visit Routh; not finding him in he shows Harriet the bracelet, proposing to dispose of it the next morning, and pay his indebtedness to Routh. Harriet suggests that he may compromise his mother by the sale of the bracelet in London; and advises him to extract the jewels and take a run over to Amsterdam where he may dispose of them to the diamond merchants there without fear of that risk. After extracting the diamonds the bracelet and some turquoise stones it contained, were placed in a sealed envelope endorsed by Dallas' signature, and deposited in a drawer in Routh's desk. Harriet, feverish with anxiety for Dallas' departure, advances him a small sum of money to pay the expenses the trip, at the same time dexterously changing Routh's overcoat for his own. Dallas departs with the intention of sailing at 7 o'clock next morning in the Argus for Rotterdam. Harriet, terribly agitated, now ties Dallas' coat compactly around a heavy square of black marble, taken from a writing table—and concealing the bundle under her shawl, issues from the house at early dawn, and cast it into the Thames. She purchases a similar marble letter weight to replace the one thus used, and returns to the house. Routh returns and Harriet declares she "has saved him!"

BOOK II.

IN CONFERENCE.

MR. CARRUTHERS is all attention in an instant. Every trace of pre-occupation has vanished. His visitor's beard has no kind of attraction for him now, though it is wagging close before his eyes. A murder! The worst case he had ever investigated was a doubtful manslaughter arising out of a poaching affray, and for his remarks on that he had been highly complimented in the local press; but here is murder—and his aid is enlisted by the Home Office!

"The facts of the case," continues Mr. Dalrymple, "are shortly these. A body of a man is seen floating off Paul's Wharf, and is hooked up by one of the men attached to the steamboat pier there. It is taken to the police station to be examined, and is then found to have been stabbed to the heart with a sharp instrument, and by a strong and clever hand. The pockets are empty, the studs have been taken from the shirt, and there is no token, pocket-book, or anything to establish its identity. 'Ordinary case enough,' you'll say, with your experience; 'ordinary case enough—drunken man decoyed into some water-side ken, robbed, and made away with—case for the police—why Lord Wolstenholme and the Home Office?' You would say that, my dear sir, influenced by your ordinary perspicacity; but I answer your 'Why.' From the appearance of this man's body, it is plain that he was not an Englishman; his clothes are not of English cut, and he had on a baize fur-lined overcoat, with a deep hood, such as no Englishman ever wears. When this description was sent to us, Lord Wolstenholme at once referred to a private correspondence which we have had with the French embassy in relation to some of the Second of December exiles who are now sheltered under the British flag, and we came to the conclusion that this was no common murder for purposes of plunder, but an act of political vengeance. Now, my dear sir, you will perceive that to penetrate a mystery of this kind is of the greatest political importance, and consequently his lordship took the matter up at once, and set every engine we have at work to elucidate it. The result of our inquiries proves that the whole chance of identification rests upon a question of coats. The last person by whom, so far as we know, the wearer of the fur-lined coat was seen alive is a waiter at a tavern in the Strand, who distinctly recollects the murdered man, whose dress he described very fully, being particularly positive about his jewelry—diamond studs, real, no 'duffers,' as he said, and of which there is no trace to be found—having dined at his eating-house, in company with another man, who had with him a blue Witney overcoat, on the inside of which was a label bearing the name of some tailer, Ewart or Evans, he is unable to state which, residing at Amherst."

"Good God!" said Mr. Carruthers, surprised out of his usual reticence. "Evans—I know the man well!"

"Very likely!" says Mr. Dalrymple, composedly. "Evans. The waiter has been had up, cross-questioned, turned inside out, but still adheres to his story. Now, as we imagine this to be a bit of political vengeance, and not an ordinary crime, and as the detectives (capital fellows in their way) have had their heads a little turned since they've been made novel heroes of, Lord Wolstenholme thought it better that I should come down into the neighborhood of Amherst, and with your assistance try to find out where and by whom this coat was bought."

No hesitation now on Mr. Carruthers' part; he and the Home Office are colleagues in this affair. Lord Wolstenholme has shown his sagacity in picking out the active and intelligent magistrate of the district, and he shall see that his confidence is not misplaced. Will Mr. Dalrymple breakfast? Mr Dalrymple has breakfasted; then a message is sent to Mrs. Carruthers to say that Mr. Carruthers presumes he may say that Mr. Dalrymple, a gentleman from London, will join them at dinner? Mr. Dalrymple will be delighted, so long as he catches the up-mail train at Amherst at—what is it?—nine fifteen. Mr. Carruthers pledges his word that Mr. Dalrymple shall be in time, and orders the barouche round at once. Will Mr. Dalrymple excuse Mr. Carruthers for five minutes? Mr. Dalrymple will; and Mr. Carruthers goes to his dressing-room, while Mr. Dalrymple re-ensconces himself in the big arm-chair, and devotes his period of solitude to paring his nails and whistling softly the while.

The big, heavy, swinging barouche, only used on solemn occasions, such as state visits, Sunday church goings, and magisterial sittings, drawn by the two big greys, and driven by Gibson, coachman, in his silver wig, his stiff collar, and his bright top-boots, and escorted by Thomas footman, in all the bloom of blue and silver livery and drab gaiters, comes round to the front door, and the gentlemen take their places in it and are driven off. The three gardeners mowing the lawn perform Hindooish obeisances as the carriage passes them; obeisances acknowledged by Mr. Carruthers with a fore-finger lifted to the brim of his hat, as modelled on a portrait of the late Duke of Wellington. Bulger at the lodge gates pulls his forelock, and receives the same gracious return. Mr. Carruthers all the time bristling with the sense of his own importance, and inwardly wishing that he could tell gardeners, lodge-keeper, and every one they met that his companion had come from the Home Office, and that they were about together to investigate a most important case of murder. Mr. Dalrymple, on the contrary, seems to have forgotten all about the actual business under treatment and might be a friend come on a few days' visit. He admires the scenery, asks about the shooting, gives his opinion on the rising crops, talks of the politics rife in the neighborhood, showing, by the way, a keen knowledge of their details, and never for an instant refers to the object of their inquiry until they are nearing the town, when he suggests that they had better alight short of their destination, and proceed on foot there. There is no particular reason for this, as probably Mr. Dalrymple knows; but he has never yet pursued an official and mysterious investigation in a barouche, and it seems to him an abnormal proceeding. So Mr. Carruthers, deferring in a courtly manner to his visitor's wishes, but, at the same time, walking beside him as though he had him in charge, they alight from the carriage, bidding the servant to wait, and walk into the town, directing their steps towards Evans, tailor.

Evans, tailor, coatless, as is his wont, and with his thumbs stuck in the arm-holes of his waistcoat, is standing at his door, and greets Mr. Carruthers with as much bow as is possible to his stout figure. Could they speak to him for a moment? by all manner of means; will Mr. Carruthers walk into the back shop? where Miss Evans, a buxom girl with many shaking curls, is discovered working a pair of Berlin wool slippers, at a glance too small for her father, and is put to flight with much blushing and giggling. The two gentlemen seat themselves in the old-fashioned black horsehair chairs, and Mr. Evans, a little excited, stands by them with his thumbs in his arm-holes, and flaps his hands occasionally, as though they were fins.

"This gentleman, Mr. Evans," says Mr. Carruthers—giving this happy specimen of his acumen and discretion in a loud and pompous tone—"has come from Lord Wolstenholme, the Secretary of State for the Home Department." Mr. Evans gives a fin-flap, indicative of profound respect. "He has been sent here to——"

"Will you permit me in the very mildest manner to interrupt you, my dear sir?" says Mr. Dalrymple, in dulcet accents. "You put the matter admirably—from the magisterial point of view—but perhaps if I were just to——You have no objection? Thank you! You've lived a long time in Amherst, Mr. Evans?"

"I've been a master tailor here, sir, forty-three years last Michaelmas."

"Forty-three years! Long time, indeed! And you're the tailor of the neighborhood, eh?"

"Well, sir, I think I may say we make for all the gentry round—Mr. Carruthers of Poynings, sir, and Sir Thomas Boldero, and——"

"Of course—of course! You've a gold-printed label, I think, which you generally sew on to all goods made by you?"

"We have, sir—that same. With my name upon it."

"With your name upon it. Just so! Now, I suppose that label is never sewed on to anything which has not been either made or sold by you?"

"Which has not been made, sir! We don't sell anything except our own make—Evans of Amherst don't."

"Exactly; and very proper, too." To Mr. Carruthers: "Settles one point, my dear sir—must have been made here! Now, Mr. Evans, you make all sorts of coats, of course, blue Witney overcoats among the number?"

Mr. Evans, after a hesitating fin-flap, says: "A blue Witney overcoat, sir, is a article seldom if ever called for in these parts. I shouldn't say we'd made one within the last two years—least-ways, more than one."

"But you think you did make one?"

"There were one, sir, made to order from a party that was staying at the Lion."

"Staying at the Lion? The inn, of course, where I slept last night. How long ago was that?"

"That were two years ago, sir."

"That won't do!" cries Mr. Dalrymple, in disappointed tone.

"Two years ago that it were made and that the party was at the Lion. The coat was sold less than three months ago."

"Was it? To whom?"

"To a stranger—a slim young gent who came in here one day promiscuous, and wanted an overcoat. He had that blue Witney, he had!"

"Now, my dear Mr. Evans," says Mr. Dalrymple, laying his hand lightly on Mr. Evans' shirt-sleeve, and looking up from under his bushy brows into the old man's face, "just try and exercise your memory a little about this stranger. Give us a little more description of him—his age, height, general appearance, and that sort of thing!"

But Mr. Evans' memory is quite unaccustomed to exercise, and cannot be jogged, or ensnared, or bullied into any kind of action. The stranger was young, "middling height," appearance, "well, gen-teel and slim-like;" and wild horses could not extract further particulars from Mr. Evans than these. Stay. "What did he give for the coat, and in what money did he pay for it?" There's a chance. Mr. Evans remembers that he "gev fifty-three-and-six for the overcoat, and handed in a ten-pun' note for change. A ten-pound note, which, as Mr. Evans, by a further tremendous effort, recollects, had "the stamp of our post office on it, as I pinted out to the gent at the time." Was the note there? No; Mr. Evans had paid it into the County Bank to his little account with some other money, but he quite recollected the post office stamp being on it.

Mr. Carruthers thinks this a great point, but is dashed by Mr. Dalrymple's telling him, on their way from the tailor's, that all bank-notes passing through post office receive the official stamp. This statement is corroborated at the Amherst Post office, where no money-order of that amount, or of anything equivalent to that amount, has been recently paid, the remittances in that form being, as the postmaster explains, generally to the canal boatmen or the railway people, and of small value.

So there the clue fails suddenly and entirely, and Mr. Carruthers and Mr. Dalrymple again mount the big swinging barouche and are driven back to Poynings to dinner, which meal is not, however, graced by the presence of either of the ladies; for Mrs. Carruthers is too ill to leave her room, and Clare is in attendance on her. So the gentlemen eat a solemn dinner by themselves, and talk a solemn conversation; and at eight o'clock Mr. Dalrymple goes away, driven by Gibson, coachman, in the carriage, and turning over in his mind how best to make something out of the uneventful day for the information of the Home Secretary.

That dignitary occupies also much of the attention of Mr. Carruthers, left in dignified solitude in the dining room before the decanters of wine and the dishes of fruit, oblivious of his wife's indisposition, and wholly unobservant of the curiosity with which Mr. Downing, his butler and body servant, surveys him on entering the room to suggest the taking of tea. Very unusual is it for the Poynings servants to regard their master with curiosity, or indeed with any feeling that bears the semblance of interest; but, be the cause what it may, there is no mistaking the present expression of Downing's face. Surprise, curiosity, and something which, if it must be called fear, is the pleasant and excited form of that feeling, prompt Mr. Downing to look fixedly at his master, who sits back in his chair in an attitude of magisterial cogitation, twirling his heavy gold eye-glass in his bonny white hands, and lost in something which resembles thought more closely than Mr. Carruthers' mental occupation can ordinarily be said to do. There he sits, until he resolves to take his niece Clare into confidence, tell her of the visit he has received from the gentleman from the Home Office, and ask her whether she can make anything of it, which resolution attained, and finding by his watch that the hour is half-past ten, and that therefore a Carruthers of Poynings may retire to rest if he chooses without indecorum, the worthy gentleman creaks up-stairs to his room, and in a few minutes is sleeping the sleep of the just. Mrs. Carruthers—Clare having been some time previously dismissed from the room—also seems to sleep soundly; at least her husband has seen that her eyes are closed.

Her rest, real or pretended, would have been none the calmer had she been able to see her faithful old servant pacing up and down the housekeeper's room, and wringing her withered hands in a agony of distress; for the servant who had gone to Amherst with Mr. Carruthers and his mysterious visitor in the morning had learned the meaning and purpose of the two gentlemen's visit to Evans, the tailor, and had made it the subject of a lively and sensational conversation in the servants' hall. Although literature was not in a very flourishing condition at Amherst, the male domestics of the household at Poynings were not without their sources of information, and had thoroughly possessed themselves of the details of the murder.

Mrs. Brookes had heard of the occurrence two or three times in the course of the preceding day but she had given it little attention. She was in her own room when the servants returned with the carriage which had taken Mr. Dalrymple to the railway station, having visited her mistress for the last time that evening, and was thinking sadly enough, of George, when the entrance of the upper housemaid, her eager face brimful of news, disturbed her.

"Oh, Mrs. Brookes," she began, "do you know who that gentleman was as dined here, and went to the town with master?"

"No, I don't," said Mrs. Brookes, with some curiosity; "do you?"

"Not exactly; but Thomas says Home Office has something to do with finding people out when they've been a-doing anything."

Mrs. Brookes began to feel uncomfortable.

"What do you mean?" she said. "Who's been doing anything that wants finding out?"

"Nobody as I knows," replied Martha, looking knowing and mysterious. "Only, you know, that murder as Mr. Downing read us the inquest of, and how it's a foreigner as has been killed because he wouldn't help to blow up the King of France; at least, there's something of that in it. Well, Mr. Downing thinks as the gentleman come about that."

"About that, here?" said Mrs. Brookes. "Whatever has put such a notion into Mr. Downing's head as that?"

"Well, Mrs. Brookes, this is it: they're all talking about it in the hall, and so I thought I'd just come and tell you. Master and the stranger gentleman didn't take the carriage right on into town; they got out just inside the pike, and went on by themselves; and, when they came back, master he looked very red and grand-looking, and the strange gentleman he looked as if he was rare disappointed and put out, and, as he was a-shutting the door of the b'rouche, Thomas heard him saying, 'No, no; there's nothing more to be done. Evans was our only chance, and he's no use.' So nat'rally Thomas wonders whatever they've been about, and what was their business with Evans; so he and coachman wasn't sorry this evening when the strange gentleman was gone by the train, and they see Evans a-loungin' about, a-flapping his hands, which he's always doing of it, up by the station. He were lookin' at the strange gentleman as sharp as sharp, as they drove up to the bookiu'-office; and when they came out, there he were, and coachman tells 'em all about it."

"All about what?" asks Mrs. Brookes, sharply.

"All about what brought master and the other gentleman to his shop; and it's his belief, as master said more than the other gentleman wanted him to say; for master let out as how a murder had something to do with the business."

"What business, Martha? Do tell me what you mean, if you want me to listen to you any longer. How could Mr. Carruthers want to know anything from Evans about a murder?"

"Lor', ma'am, it weren't about the murder; it were about the coat! Master told Evans as how there had been a murder, and the other gentleman asked Evans no end of questions—did he make such and such coats? and who did he sell 'em to? and partic'lar did he sell Witney coats? which Mr. Evans said he didn't in general, and had only sold one in two years, which the strange gentleman wanted to know what sort of gent had had it, and were he young or old. Two years is a long time to remember the sale of a coat, Martha."

"It wasn't so long since it were sold. Mr. Evans sold it six weeks ago, but it were two years made."

Mrs. Brooke's heart gave a great bound, and her old eyes grew dim; but she was a brave woman, and Martha, housemaid, was a dull one.

"Did Mr. Evans not succeed in describing the person who bought the coat, then?"

"He thinks not; but he says he should know him again immediate, if he saw him. The strange gentleman didn't seem over-pleased that his memory was so short; but lor', who's to know all about the eyeses and the noses of everybody as comes to buy a coat, or wot not?—partic'lar if you don't know as he's been a committen of a murder. If you did, why, you'd look at him closer like, I should say!"

"Has Mr. Downing got the paper with the murder of the foreigner in it?" asked Mrs. Brookes.

"Yes, he have; he's just been reading it all over again in the hall. And he says as how master's in a brown study, as he calls it; only it's in the dining room, and he's sure as the finding-out people has put it into his hands."

"When he has done with the paper, ask him to let me see it, Martha. Very likely this stranger's visit has nothing to do with the matter. Downing finds out things that nobody else can see."

"It looks as if he was right this time, however, there ain't nothing clearer than the person who was seen at the eating-house with the victim" (Martha "took in" the Hatchet of Horror every week, and framed her language on that delightful model) "had on a coat as Evans made; it looks as if he wasn't altogeter in the wrong, now don't it, Mrs. Brookes?"

Mrs. Brooks could not deny that it looked very like, and her brave old heart almost died within her. But she kept down her fear and horror, and dismissed Martha, telling her to bring her the paper as soon as she could. The woman returned in a few moments, laid the newspaper beside Mrs. Brookes, and then went off to enjoy a continuation of the gossip of the servants' hall. Though the servants had no inkling of the terribly strong interest, the awfully near connexion, which existed for Poynings in the matter, it was still a great privilege to be "in" so important an affair by even the slender link formed by the probable purchase of a coat at Amherst by the murderer. They discussed it over and over again, assigning to the murdered man every grade of rank short of royalty, and all the virtues possible to human nature. The women were particularly eloquent and sympathising, and Martha "quite cried," as she speculated on the great probability of there being a broken-hearted sweetheart in the case.

In the housekeeper's room, Mrs. Brookes sat poring over the terrible story, to which she had listened carelessly on the previous day, as the servants talked it vaguely over. From the first words Martha had spoken, her fears had arisen, and now they were growing every instant to the terrible certainty of conviction. What if the wretched young man, who had already been the cause of so much misery, had added this fearful crime to the long catalogue of his follies and sins?

All the household sleeps, and the silence of the night is in every room but one. There Mrs. Brookes still sits by the table with the newspaper spread before her, lost in a labyrinth of fear and anguish; and from time to time her grief finds words, such as:

"How shall I tell her? How shall I warn her? O George, George! O my boy! my boy!"

CHAPTER III.

THE SHADOW OF DEATH.

Mr. Carruthers was an early man, and made his rounds every morning at an hour which the indoor servants, who were obliged to have breakfast ready on his return, considered heathenish, and the out-door servants declared savored of slave-driving. Mrs. Brookes knew that she should have no difficulty in procuring a private interview with her mistress on the morning following Mr. Dalrymple's visit, as an hour always elapsed between Mr. Carruther's leaving the house and his wife's ringing for her maid. The old woman looked worn and weary and very old, as she watched her master take his creaking way down the staircase, looking as he went more full of self-importance than usual, and treading more heavily, as if the weight of the Home Office communication had got into his boots.

When he had disappeared, and she had heard the click of the lock as he opened the great door and went out into the pure fresh morning air, Mrs. Brookes emerged from behind the partition door, and softly took the way to Mrs. Carruthers' bedroom. The outer door was slightly open, the heavy silken, curtain within hung closely over the aperture. The old woman pushed it gently aside, and, noiselessly crossing the room, drew the window curtain, and let in sufficient light to allow her to see that Mrs. Carruthers was still sleeping. Her face, pale, and even in repose bearing a troubled expression, was turned towards the old woman, who seated herself in an arm-chair beside the bed, and looked silently and sadly on the features, whose richest bloom and earliest sign of fading she had so faithfully watched.

"How am I to tell her?" she thought. "How am I to make her see what I see, suspect what I suspect? and yet she must know all, for the least imprudence, a moment's forgetfulness, would ruin him. How am I to tell her?"

The silver bell of a little French clock on the chimney-piece rang out the hour melodiously, but its warning struck upon the old woman's ear menacingly. There was much to do, and little time to do it in; she must not hesitate longer. So she laid her withered, blanched old hand upon the polished, ivory-white fingers of the sleeper, lying with the purposelessness of deep sleep upon the coverlet, and addressed her as she had been used to do in her girlhood, and her early desolate widowhood, when her humble friend had been well-nigh her only one.

"My dear," she said, "my dear." Mrs. Carruthers' hand twitched in her light grasp; she turned her head away with a troubled sigh, but yet did not wake. The old woman spoke again: "My dear, I have something to say to you."

Then Mrs. Carruthers awoke fully, and to an instantaneous comprehension that something was wrong. All her fears, all her suspicions of the day before, returned to her mind in one flash of apprehension, and she sat up white and breathless.

"What is it, Ellen? Has he found out? Does he know?"

"Who? What do you mean?"

"Mr. Carruthers. Does he know George was here?"

"God forbid," said the old woman, in a trembling tone.

She felt the task she had before her almost beyond her power of execution. But her mistress' question, her instinctive fear, had given her a little help.

"No," she said, "he knows nothing, and God send he may neither know nor suspect anything about our dear boy; but you must be quiet now and listen to me, for I must have said my say before Dixon comes—she must not find me here."

"Why are you here?" asked Mrs. Carruthers, who had sat up in bed, and was now looking at the old woman, with a face which had no more trace of color than the pillow from which it had just been raised. "Tell me, Ellen; do not keep me in suspense. Is anything wrong about George? It must concern him, whatever it is."

"My dear," began Mrs. Brookes—and now she held the slender fingers tightly in her withered palm—"I fear there is something very wrong with George."

"Is he—is he dead?" asked the mother, in a faint voice.

"No, no; he is well and safe, and far away from this, I hope and trust."

Mrs. Carruthers made no answer, but she gazed at her old friend with irresistible, pitiful entreaty. Mrs. Brookes answered the dumb appeal.

"Yes, my dear, I'll tell you all. I must, for his sake. Do you know what was the business that brought that strange gentleman here, he that went out with master, and dined here last night? No, you don't. 'I thought not. Thank God, you have got no hint of it from any one but me."

"Go on, go on," said Mrs. Carruthers, in a yet fainter voice.

"Do you remember, when George was here in February, you gave him money to buy a coat?"

"Yes," Mrs. Carruthers rather sighed than said.

"He bought one at Evans', and he was remarked by the old man, who would know him again if he saw him. The business on which the strange gentleman came to master, was to get him to help, as a migistrate, in finding the person who bought that coat at Evans', Amherst."

"But why? What had he done? How was the coat known?"

"My dear," said Mrs. Brookes, and now she laid one arm gently round her mistress' shoulder as she leaned against the pillows, "the wearer of that coat is suspected of having murdered a man, whose body was found by the river-side in London the other day."

"My God!" moaned the mother, and a hue as of death overspread her features."

"My dear, he didn't do it. I'm sure he didn't do it. I would stake my soul upon it; it is some dreadful mistake Keep up until I have done, for God's sake, and George's sake, keep up—remember there is no danger unless you lose courage and give them a hint of anything. Be sure we shall find he has sold the coat to some one else, and that some one has done this dreadful thing. But you must keep up—here, let me bathe your face and hands while I am talking, and then I'll go away, and, when Dixon comes, you must just say you are not well, and don't mean to get up to breakfast, and then I shall have an excuse for coming to you. There! you are better now, I am sure. Yes, yes, don't try to speak; I'll tell you without asking," she went on, in a rapid whisper. "The strange gentleman and master saw Evans, and he told them when he sold the coat, and the sort of person he sold it to; but Gibson and Thomas say he could not have told them distinct, for they heard the strange gentleman saying to master, in the carriage, that the description was of no use. And I am certain sure that there is not the least suspicion that he has ever been in Amherst since he bought the coat."

"I don't understand," stammered Mrs. Carruthers. When —when did this happen?"

"A few days ago: it's all in the papers."

Mrs. Carruthers groaned.

"Nothing about George, but about finding the body and the coat. It is all here." The old woman took a tightly folded newspaper from her pocket. The light was too dim for her to read its contents to her mistress, who was wholly incapable of reading them herself. Mrs. Brookes, paper in hand, was going to the window, to withdraw the curtain completely, when she paused.

"No," she said; "Dixon will be here too soon. Better that you should ring for her at once, and send her for me. Can you do this, my dear? keeping yourself up by remembering that this is only some dreadful mistake, and that George never did it—no, no more than you did. Can you let me go away for a few minutes, and then come back to you? Remember, we cannot be too careful, for his sake, and if Dixon found me here at an unusual hour, the servants would know there is some secret or another between us."

"I can bear anything you tell me," was Mrs. Carruthers' answer, in a whisper.

"Well then, first lie down, and I will close the curtains and leave you. When I have had time to get to my room, ring for Dixon. Tell her you are ill. When she lets the light in she will see that for herself, and desire her to send me to you."

In another minute, the room was once more in darkness, and Mrs. Brookes went down the grand staircase, in order to avoid meeting any of the servants, crossed the hall, and gained her own apartment without being observed. A short time, but long to her impatience, had elapsed, when Mrs. Carruthers' maid knocked at the door, and having received permission to enter, came in with an important face. She delivered the message which Mrs. Brookes was expecting, and added that she had never seen her lady look so ill in all her born days.

"Looks more like a corpse, I do assure you, than like the lady as I undressed last night, and circles under her eyes, dreadful. But, if you please, Mrs. Brookes, you was to go to her immediately, and I'm to let Mrs. Carruthers know as she's to make tea this morning for master, all to their two selves, which he won't like it, I dare say."

Mrs. Brookes hurried to her unhappy mistress. She had again raised herself in the bed, and was looking eagerly towards the door, with hollow, haggard eyes, and lips ashy pale, whose trembling she in vain tried to control.

"Lock both doors, Ellen," she said, "and tell me all. Give me the paper; I can read it—I can indeed."

She took it, and read it steadily through—read it with the same horrible emotion, a thousand times intensified, which had agitated the faithful servant a few hours previously. Standing by the bedside, Mrs. Brookes gazed upon her pale, convulsed features, as she read, and ever, as she saw the increasing agony which they betrayed, she murmured in accents of earnest entreaty:

"Don't, my dear, for God's sake, don't, not for a moment, don't you believe it. He sold the coat, depend upon it. It looks very bad, very black and bad, but you may be sure there's no truth in it. He sold the coat."

She spoke to deaf ears. When Mrs. Carruthers had read the last line of the account of the inquest on the body of the unknown man, the paper dropped from her hand; she turned upon the old nurse a face which, from that moment, she never had the power to forget, and said:

"He wore it—I saw it on him on Friday," and the next moment slipped down among the pillows, and lay as insensible as a stone.

OBITUARY.—FRANK WOOD, an old and well known citizen of the firm of Hodge & Wood, stationers, died on Sunday last in this city. Deceased had numerous closely attached friends, and was characterized by a singularly generous and unselfish disposition. A more kindly man, or one more humane and thoroughly amiable, more ready to offer a helping hand to any in need of it, it would be hard to find. The deceased was buried from the Geary street Unitarian Church toward the erection of which he had liberally contributed. The affecting funeral discourse of the Rev. Mr. Stebbins, will not be soon forgotten by the friends of the deceased.

NO MORE appropriate gift for the Holiday present can be found than a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine. These Machines have lately been greatly improved, and are now considered the very best for Family use.

THE CHRISTMAS FIRESIDE.

FOR GOOD LITTLE BOYS AND GIRLS.

BY GRANDFATHER TWAIN.

THE STORY OF THE BAD LITTLE BOY THAT BORE A CHARMED LIFE.

["Mark Twain," our California humorist, having left us, we are beseiged with requests to republish many of his inimitable sketches written for THE CALIFORNIAN. "The Christmas Fireside" being a seasonable story, we comply with the request of many subscribers in this instance.]

ONCE there was a bad little boy, whose name was Jim—though, if you will notice, you will find that bad little boys are nearly always called James in your Sunday-school books. It was very strange, but still it was true, that this one was called Jim.

He didn't have any sick mother, either—a sick mother who was pious and had the consumption, and would be glad to lie down in the grave and be at rest, but for the strong love she bore her boy, and the anxiety she felt that the world would be harsh and cold toward him when she was gone. Most bad boys in the Sunday books are named James, and have sick mothers who teach them to say, "Now, I lay me down," etc., and sing them to sleep with sweet plaintive voices, and then kiss them good-night, and kneel down by the bedside and weep. But it was different with this fellow. He was named Jim, and there wasn't anything the matter with his mother—no consumption, or anything of that kind. She was rather stout than otherwise, and she was not pious; moreover, she was not anxious on Jim's account; she said if he were to break his neck, it wouldn't be much loss; she always spanked Jim to sleep, and she never kissed him good-night; on the contrary, she boxed his ears when she was ready to leave him.

Once, this little bad boy stole the key of the pantry and slipped in there and helped himself to some jam, and filled up the vessel with tar, so that his mother would never know the difference; but all at once a terrible feeling didn't come over him, and something didn't seem to whisper to him, "Is it right to disobey my mother? Isn't it sinful to do this? Where do bad little boys go who gobble up their good kind mother's jam?" and then he didn't kneel down all alone and promise never to be wicked any more, and rise up with a light, happy heart, and go and tell his mother all about it and beg her forgiveness, and be blessed by her with tears of pride and thankfulness in her eyes. No; that is the way with all other bad boys in the books, but it happened otherwise with this Jim, strangely enough. He ate that jam, and said it was bully, in his sinful, vulgar way; and he put in the tar, and said that was bully also, and laughed, and observed that "the old woman would get up and snort" when she found it out; and when she did find it out he denied knowing anything about it, and she whipped him severely, and he did the crying himself. Everything about this boy was curious—everything turned out differently with him from the way it does to the bad Jameses in the books.

Once he climbed up in Farmer Acorn's apple tree to steal apples, and the limb didn't break, and he didn't fall and break his arm, and get torn by the farmer's great dog, and then languish on a sick bed for weeks and repent and become good. Oh, no—he stole as many apples as he wanted, and came down all right, and he was all ready for the dog, too, and knocked him endways with a rock when he came to tear him. It was very strange—nothing like it ever happened in those mild little books with marbled backs, and with pictures in them of men with swallow-tailed coats and bell-crowned hats and pantaloons that are short in the legs, and women with the waists of their dresses under their arms and no hoops on. Nothing like it in any of the Sunday-school books.

Once he stole the teacher's penknife, and when he was afraid it would be found out and he would get whipped, he slipped it into George Wilson's cap—poor Widow Wilson's son, the moral boy, the good little boy of the village, who always obeyed his mother, and never told an untruth, and was fond of his lessons and infatuated with Sunday-school. And when the knife dropped from the cap and poor George hung his head and blushed, as if in conscious guilt, and the grieved teacher charged the theft upon him, and was just in the very act of bringing the switch down upon his trembling shoulders, a white-haired improbable justice of the peace did not suddenly appear in their midst and strike an attitude and say, "Spare this noble boy—there stands the cowering culprit! I was passing the school door at recess, and, unseen myself, I saw the theft committed!" And then Jim didn't get whaled, and the venerable justice didn't read the tearful school a homily, and take George by the hand and say such a boy deserved to be exalted, and then tell him to come and make his home with him, and sweep out the office, and make fires, and run errands, and chop wood, and study law, and help his wife to do household labors, and have all the balance of the time to play, and get forty cents a month, and be happy. No, it would have happened that way in the books, but it didn't happen that way to Jim. No meddling old clam of a justice dropped in to make trouble, and so the model boy George got threshed, and Jim was glad of it. Because, you know, Jim hated moral boys. Jim said he was "down on them milksops." Such was the coarse language of this bad, neglected boy.

But the strangest things that ever happened to Jim was the time he went boating on Sunday and didn't get drowned, and that other time that he got caught out in the storm when he was fishing on Sunday, and didn't get struck by lightning. Why, you might look, and look, and look through the Sunday-school books, from now till next Christmas, and you would never come across anything like this. Oh, no—you would find that all the bad boys who go boating on Sunday invariably get drowned, and all the bad boys who get caught out in storms, when they are fishing on Sunday, infallibly get struck by lightning. Boats with bad boys in them always upset on Sunday, and it always storms when bad boys go fishing on the Sabbath. How this Jim ever escaped is a mystery to me.

This Jim bore a charmed life—that must have been the way of it. Nothing could hurt him. He even gave the elephant in the menagerie a plug of tobacco, and the elephant didn't knock the top of his head off with his trunk. He browsed around the cupboard after essence of peppermint, and didn't make a mistake and drink aqua fortis. He stole his father's gun and went hunting on the Sabbath, and didn't shoot three or four of his fingers off. He struck his little sister on the temple with his fist when he was angry, and she didn't linger in pain through long summer days and die with sweet words of forgiveness upon her lips that redoubled the anguish of his breaking heart. No—she got over it. He ran off and went to sea at last, and didn't come back and find himself sad and alone in the world, his loved ones sleeping in the quiet churchyard, and the vine-embowered home of his boyhood tumbled down and gone to decay. Ah, no—he came home drunk as a piper, and got into the station house the first thing.

And he grew up, and married, and raised a large family, and brained them all with an axe one night, and got wealthy by all manner of cheating and rascality, and now he is the infernalist wickedest scoundrel in his native village, and is universally respected, and belongs to the Legislature.

So you see there never was a bad James in the Sunday-school books that had such a streak of luck as this sinful Jim with the charmed life. MARK TWAIN.

A BLAST AGAINST MR. PEABODY.

THE Springfield Republican, is not disposed to allow Mr. George Peabody, quite as much credit for his liberal gifts to American libraries and Colleges, as has been generally awarded him. It says;

"A good fair honest business heart is his, doubtless, and that must have moved him to make amends in this way for the injustice he has done his native country and the thrift that has followed his speculations upon her misfortunes. For all who know anything on the subject know very well that he and his partners in London gave us no faith and no help in our struggle for national existence. They participated to the full in the common English distrust of our cause, and our success, and talked and acted for the South, rather than for the Nation.

American-born and American-bred, the financial representatives of Americans in England, they were thus guilty of a grievous error in judgment and a grievous weakness of heart. They swelled the popular feeling of doubt abroad, and speculated upon it. Through no house were so many American securities—railroad, state and national—sent home for sale as by them. No individuals contributed so much to flooding our money markets with the evideaces of our debt, held in Europe, and breaking down their prices and weakening financial confidence in our nationality as George Peabody & Company; and none made more money by the operation.

"All the money and more, we presume, that Mr. Peabody is giving away so lavishly among our institutions of learning, was gained by speculations of his house in our misfortunes. He and his associates have now seen how mistakenly they judged their country and their country-men; and we honor Mr. Peabody that now his sense of justice moves him to such silent confession and substantial reparation. It is more to his credit that he should be thus moved than that his gifts to us were born of a simple, lavish, wanton generosity. It is harder, and so it is nobler, for human nature to be just than to be generous. And as a tribute justice, Mr. Peabody's donations to science in America, to the improvement and education of the people, exhibit him in the best possible light.

"We observe a suggestion that some of his gifts should be directed towards the soldiers and sailors of the war, that thus his justice to himself and to us may be more pertinent and practical. But we do not respond to this idea. The war leaves fewer objects of charity than was expected; and they and we would rather these should be cared for out of the pockets of their fellows in the experience. Mr. Peabody does quite well to direct his large donations to the enlargement of our national character, against which his true offense was, through a deepening and widening of the means of knowledge. For thus our people best grow great, and fortify themselves against renewed misfortunes and his successors against renewed mistakes of the kind that are past."

AMUSEMENTS.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.—The rains have evidently affected the atteudance at this, our most popular theatre, during the week. What if Manager Maguire did produce the amusing and richly-costumed burlesque of Lalla Rookh, full of mirth and music, with eutire new and beautiful scenery by the Tornings? People, ladies in particular, could not be expected to brave the fierce winds and pelting rains to come and see it, however strong their inclination might be to do so. Lalla Rookh was unfortunate in being born under a cloud. We hope for clear skies next week, for, aside from the inconvenience of wet weather, every branch of business—even to that of the proverbial farmer to whom the rain is always "doing good"—must have suffered by the slightly curtailed edition of the original Forty Day's flood that we have had this week.

This afternoon and evening will be presented an original dramatic version of one of Miss Braddon's novels—The Captain of the Vulture, by an attache of one of our daily papers. The story is dramatic and full of action, and will be placed on the Opera House stage with effective accessories of costumes, properties, and scenery. Lady Don will personate "Sir Norvell Mortimer;" Mrs. Jackson "Millicent Duke;" Mrs. Judah "Sarah Clapper;" Mr. Edwards "George Duke," Captain of the Vulture; P. Thayer "Darrell Markham;" Harry Jackson "Samuel Clapper;" and other characters by the company.

MAGUIRE'S ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—It may be very true that there is nothing new under the sun, but at the same time the wonders of the East are new to the inhabitants of the West. No one who has witnessed the performances of the troupe of Japanese gymnasts at present at the Academy of Music can fail to confess that many of their feats are of a character undreamed of in their wildest flights of fancy. San Francisco is highly privileged in being the first city outside the Empire of Japan to witness this startlingly novel exhibition. The ensuing week is the last during which an opportunity will be afforded our citizens to see these artists. They will proceed hence to Paris to amaze the representatives of the nations of the world who will assemble at the Great Exposition. When we in San Francisco read the comments of the European press on these—to them—new and strange performauces, we can say, "Yes, yes, very wonderful, but nothing new to us; we saw it all many months ago." Those, however, who have not yet paid a visit to Maguire's Academy of Music during the engagement of these Japanese artists, must do so during the coming week, rain or shine.

THE Second Concert of M. and Mme. Joseph Heine was given at Platt's Hall last Monday evening, to an audience by no means so large as the artists deserved, but of the sort that we like to see on such occasions—quietly uppreciative during the performance of each piece, and reserving their applause until it is completely finished. We have never seen in San Francisco an audience so happily free from those musical pests whose natural coarseness of organization leads them to rustle their programme, stamp their feet, drop their canes, talk to their neighbors, applaud in the wrong places, and in an endless variety of ways make themselves intolerable, thinking all the while that they are enjoying the music which they spoil for everybody else. That such a performance as the Heines could find so intelligent a circle of hearers, is certainly an encouraging sign of our musical progress; and we only regret that the circle is not yet large enough to secure to the artists their just pecuniary reward. The programme comprised Tartiui's Trille du Diable, Vieuxtemps' Fantasie on airs from I Lombardi, a difficult solo for one string, by Paganini; and a duet on themes from Le Prophete, in all of which the surprising skill of M. Heine with the violin, and the almost equally remarkable talent and grace of Mme. Heine as a pianist and accompanist, were fully displayed; Mme. Heine also appeared to great advantage in Mendelssohn's grand Rondo in B minor, and in a brilliant arrangement of Le tre Mozze Polka, by Oury. The Misses Howson and Messrs. Herberte and Wunderlich, accompanied by Prof. Geo. T. Evans at the piano, sang several solos and duets, which were received with marked favor by the audience; and Miss Short, a lady amateur, made her "first appearance" in two English songs, not rendered with such success as to justify her in making another atttempt before a critical public.

MANY persons have suggested that a sacred concert given by M. and Mme. Heine, assisted by the musical talent in our midst on some Sunday evening, would meet with general favor. During the present holy days of the Church we should judge that such an entertainment would prove very acceptable.

PACIFIC MUSEUM OF ANATOMY.—While the ministers of various religions are exhorting people on Sunday evening to regard the welfare of their immortal souls, Dr. Jordan, at the Anatomical Museum, Montgomery street, by his Sunday evening lectures on Physiology, gives them important lessons on taking care of their poor perishable bodies. So both ends are accomplished: Idoneum est ut sit mens sana in corpore sano.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—These beautiful gardens being formed on a sandy soil afford a most pleasant retreat from the mud of the city. A few hours of sunshine render the walks comfortably dry and the rain has caused the grass and rare shrubs to assume a delightful verdure. The fine collection of animals form a great attraction.

LITERARY FESTIVAL.—The second anniversary of the Addisonian Literary Society was celebrated last evening at Congress Hall. The attendance was large, and the exercises, consisting of vocal music, declamations, and debates, were pleasant, able, and entertaining.

MRS. LAURA CUPPY lectures as usual at Maguire's Opera House on Sunday evening, commencing at 8 o'clock. Subject: "True and False Spiritualism." Questions relative to the subject solicited at close of the lecture.

CALIFORNIA TYPE FOUNDRY.—Messrs. Wm. Faulkner & Son, proprietors of the extensive printing-press and type warehouse of this city, after months of preparation, inaugurated their Pioneer Type Foundry last week. They are now ready to furnish a superior quality of type, cast to order, at lower rates than it can be imported for. Every description of stereotyping and electrotyping will also be done at their foundry. This enterprise is one that newspaper publishers and job printers have long felt the need of.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No II.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; Intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

CHARACTERISTICS of medicnl men of to-day, by Dr. Trall: "The minds—professional minds—of medical men of this day are as mystified and twistified, as superstitious and fauntical, as irratioual and absurd, so far as medical logic is concerned, as were the minds of medical men in thut by-gone age, when charms, magic, incantations, and necromancy, were among the remedial resources. And so their minds will remain until they have some fixed basis, some settled principles to reason from." These things being trne, who would he an Allopath?

DR. DICKSON: "The ancients endeavored to elevate physic to the dignity of a science, but failed; the moderns, with more success, have endeavored to reduce it to the level of a trade."

SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH was not the only man who left the profession of physic in disgust; Crabbe, Davy, Lord Longdale, and hundreds of other learned men, have done the same.

CURES guarnnteed to the sick, in almost all cases, even after the medicine dcctors have poisoned them with drugs to the last point of safety in not taking life, by DR. BOURNE, No. 10 Mnsonic Temple, Post street, who can make the guarantee, because he neither employs medicines uor the cajolery of mesmerism, but proceeds upon the basis of square, solid, natural common sense and science.

THE eminent author and physician, Dr. Dewees, retired from practice many years before his decease, and about the year 1840, expressed his increasing want of confidence in medical practice in conversations with DR. BOURNE. A very respectable physician in 1839 would not make use of a pail full of cold water in fever until the patient and friends solemnly pledged themselves to hold him blameless in case of unfortunate results!

IN San Francisco, in 1853, a physician, in a case of small-pox, would not permit his patient the use of cold water as a beverage even, though fiercely raving for it, until the poor fellow had passed the latitudo of hope, when he said "Let him have all the cold water he wishes, he is bound to die anyhow." A gallon of iced water was given him, which he drank in an incredibly short time; reason returned; he begged for the Water Cure doctor; but the Allopath had too good a hold, and declared, "I'll never give him up while the breath of life is in him." A few more days of raving and death sealed another stalwart and noble looking (New Englander) victim to the insatiate stupidity and criminal ignorance of medical practice; and it is not at all improbable but the same thing would be repeated to-day with bleeding, blistering, plastering, etc.

RHEUMATISM.—Thousands of persons who have saturated themselves with quack nostrums, run the gauntlet of the "regulars," made themselves as slimy as the crawling reptile of a Louisiana bayou in taking "mud baths," or drank the water which resembleth "decayed hen fruit," and all to no purpose, have then taken a few of "Dr. Bourne's Baths" and been speedily and permanently cured. They cure where all else fails. Cures guarantced for a stipulated price; and that does not mean patchwork, but cures. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Also, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc.

GREAT REDUCTION IN LADIES' DRESS AND DRY GOODS.—The telegraph has informed us of the recent fall of prices in dress and dry goods in the New York market; and we are authorized to announce that the retail house of MEAGHER, TAAFFE & CO., of this city, in consequence of the dry goods tumble at the East, will open the coming week with a great reduction in the prices of their immense stock of goods; which will be marked down to lower rates than dry goods have ever been sold for for years back, as an especial bid for the great Holiday trade, and as the most effective means of reducing their large stock on hand.

The goods reduced in prices consist of ladies' dress goods—silks, empress cloths of every variety, poplins, etc., which have been reduced to the following figures:

5,000 yards Super French Empress Cloth, in plain and striped, at 50 cents—worth $1

6,000 yards Plain All-wool Poplins, at 75 cents—worth $1 25.

10,000 yards Fine All-wool Empress Cloth, all colors, at $1—worth $1 50.

WE visited the store of J. W. Tucker & Co., yesterday, and must say that it is one of the most beautiful sights in the city; stocked as it is with its wealth of bright gems and Jewellry, Diamonds, Pearls, Amethysts, Topaz, Emeralds, Ruhys, Sapphires, Corals, Watches, Silver ware, etc. For purchasing valnable Holiday Gifts—gems of the earth and sea that fade not nor depreciate in value—there is no place like Tucker's. *

WOOD AND COAL.—Shea & Co., 513 Bush street, keep none but the best of dry, seasoned wood, and the best of coal, for their customers. They invite a trial. Orders delivered to any part of the city. *

ADDRESS
TO THE PROPERTY-OWNERS OF SAN FRANCISCO.

FELLOW-CITIZENS:—The Managers of the BUILDERS' INSURANCE COMPANY would submit a few suggestions for your consideration:

For some years past the property-owners of San Francisco were completely at the mercy of a well-organized monopoly of Insurance Agents, who formed themselves into a "Board of Underwriters," fixed a high tariff of Insurance Premiums, which was framed to tax the people, and which DID tax them to the tune of about a Million Dollars a year!—that is, a Million Dollars a year MORE THAN WAS NECESSARY to insure property against loss by fire, for there is not a city in the world where can he found a more prompt and efficient system for extinguishing fires than in San Francisco.

Well, it struck a few of us that this heavy tax might be considerably abated, and as we have aided hundreds of persons in the city to erect new houses, we called some of them together and formed from the working mechanics an Insurance Company of our own, viz: THE BUILDERS' INSURANCE COMPANY.

Behold, the old "Underwriters" waxed wrathy and refused to recognize us—actually and insolently refusing to underwrite with us; in other words, refused to insure any person who insured any part of his property with us. It is the custom of most people to insure their property in two or three offices. Every man has as perfect a right to insure his house wherever he pleases, as he has to purchase a cigar wherever he pleases. But the sapient "Board of Underwriters" denied the right, and denounced all who insured with the "Builders' Insurance Company"—setting their agents, like a pack of steamboat runners, to talk down the reputation and solvency of the men who form the "Builders' Insurance Company."

Well, the "Builders' Insurance Company" worked upon their own judgment and responsibility; they have fixed their own rates, according to building, and not according to a fixed scale for all, as the others did. This, of course, was a vulgar and a low innovation—and so the "Board of Underwriters" denounced us—actually alleging we were "ignorant" of our business, and "rotten" and "solvent," and all that.

Now mark! A few short months' operation of our "Needle Guns" brought them down! THE MONOPOLY IS BROKEN! "The Board of Underwriters" have burst into a dozen fragments.

Those monopolists, fellow-citizens, might have been forgiven for drawing a million dollars a year from you more than was necessary, had they been generous or charitable, or even useful in the application of a portion of that immense tax. But tell us, if you know, what charity they have aided, what struggling manufacturer have they assisted? What new branch of industry have they organized and cherished? What enterprise have they instituted? What premiums have they ever offered for the development of a new branch of industry—the silk, cotton, vine or hop culture, for instance?

Half of the Insurance Companies are owned by men and women who live far away from California, who live sumptuously in New York, New England, and in Old England. The absentee Insurance Companies draw off half a million a year, which goes to the aid of New England or Liverpool merchants, to whom it is lent at long dates for six per cent. per annum, while the California manufacturers, struggling to keep their heads over water, have to pay eighteen per cent. per annum for money, when they can get the money. And what have the local Insurance Companies done, with their enormous surpluses, in aiding the development of any industry in California that would give permanent employment to the people? Remember that grand buildings give but short lived employment to labor. They are not reproductive of beneficial industry; and when the city is built up grandly, if there be not a busy back country to support it, it will go back again.

These Companies must open a new leaf with the people. They must lower their rates; they must assist the public charites; they must assist the struggling manufacturers by long loans on their machinery; they must give premiums for the cultivation of the Hop, the Mulberry the Vine, the Cotton tree, the Rice field and the Sugar cane. They They must aid joint stock companies which may be formed in the State for the manufacture of various articles for which this part of the Union is so well suited.

It may be said that all this is foreign to the objects of an Insurance Company, which is formed they will tell you, with a view to make large Dividends for its stockholders, under the nominal pretense of assuring the unfortunate against losses by fire.

"This is the "red tape" language of the eaved-in "Board of Underwriters," but is not the language of the undersigned. on behalf of himself and associates in the BUILDERS' INSURANCE COMPANY.

SANTA CLAUS' VISITS.—Among the hundreds of thousands of visits of this ancient individual, will he that to the Masonic Temple, No. 1 Montgomery street, where he has been leaving orders for Boys' Clothing to be presented by him to them on Christmas morning. Santa Claus visits this above place regularly every Christmas morning, and others would do well to follow his example. S. Figel manufactures to order, and has ready for sale the largest supply of Youths' and Boys' Clothing to be had in any other establishment in the same line of business in the city. His terms are moderate and the goods of the best quality. Call and leave your orders early, for Santa Claus has a great many orders to fill. *

HOLIDAY PREPARATIONS.—STEVENS, of the late firm of STEVENS & OLIVER, is making grand preparations for the Holidays, and informs his patrons and the public that he is now prepared to furnish Parties and Weddings with everything required in his line. And to supply the increasing demand in the cuisine department, has associated with him Mr. McDonald, the celebrated caterer for the public; formally at the corner of Clay and Leidsdorff streets, whose well known reputation for the serving up of the choicest oysters, clams, and seasonable delicacies, is a most enviable one. This, with the late improvements that MR. STEVENS has made in his establishment, must serve to make it for San Francisco what Taylor's is to New York—the most popular place of its kind. *

NEW TOYS.—Feldbush, 207 Montgomery street, received by last steamer an immense assortment of toys. He has on hand the largest stock of toys in San Francisco, which he offers at retail at his Montgomery-street store, No. 207. FELDBUSH offers superior facilities for selecting the newest toys. *

TO MY DAUGHTER JOSEPHINE.

O PART of my being, so loving and free ;
In joy or in sorrow, my dreams are of thee!
In each kindred feature, in each striking line,
I see my own image traced nicely in thine.

When lonely and weary I think of the past,
And glance at the future with shadows o'ercast,
O quick as the moments that rapidly flee,
Revert my sad musings, sweet daughter, to thee!

Through all trying changes be happy as now,
With no clouds of sorrow o'erhanging thy brow ;
What rude hand so daring as seek to displace,
The bright sunny gladness that beams on thy face!

Be peaceful thy slumbers, unshadowed thy way,
And time spare thy beauty from speedy decay,
And O my fair daughter so gentle and kind,
May life's heavy burden rest light on thy mind.

Where e'er thou mayst wander my hope and my pride,
May faith be thy comfort and virtue thy guide;
Thy heart warm and tender by care never wrung,
Unwounded by envy, by malice unstung.

Shun snares in life's pathway that shine to allure
A peace that is holy, a heart that is pure ;
And when in thy chamber thou bendest the knee
Remember thy father who fondly loves thee?

San Francisco, December, 1866. JAMES LINEN.

A VISIT TO BAGDAD.

THERE is a great sameness in the appearance presented by the banks of the Tigris. The country around is flat, with few ancient remains visible to attest its former greatness. Turning a bend of the river, we sight the tall minarets and domes of the great capital itself. Bagdad, the "City of the Caliphs," is before us. Like Moslem pilgrims when they first descry in the hazy distance the glittering pinnacles of the sacred Kaaba in holy Mecca, we gaze with eager eyes on the object of so much longing curiosity.

Situated in the very midst of a desert, the great city rises out of the plain as if by enchantment. The appearance of Bagdad from a distance is striking in the extreme, and the sight of the palm-trees mingled with the buildings, and relieving the eye with their bright and beautiful foliage, is pleasing beyond anything, after the tiresome sameness of the desert, only broken, as it is, by clumps of brush-wood.

The steamer was soon anchored abreast of the town, which stretches on both sides of the Tigris, and which is here about seven hundred and fifty feet in width. The chief means of communication is by ferry-boats, but there is also a bridge of boats higher up the stream than where we lay. The captain and I landed at once.

Bagdad is surrounded by a wall about eight miles in circumference, and strong enough to keep out Persians and Bedouins, though useless against artillery. Some cannon of ancient manufacture are mounted in flanking towers, and the garrison is numerically strong enough to hold the place; but discipline is very lax in the ranks, and the soldiers are always embroiling themselves in street rows with the inhabitants. There are three very handsome gates, but they are sadly out of repair. Among the chief objects of note are the numerous "khans" or "caravanserais" in the city, but they are not so handsome or so spacious as those in Persia. As these "khans" are very characteristic of the modes of life of Oriental races, and are not to be found in India, I will give a general description of them.

Caravanserais are edifices admirably adapted for the purpose of sheltering both man and beast. There is only a single entrance, generally a handsome Saracenic gateway, and this leads into the interior space, which is quadrangular, and open to the sky. Round this there is a piazza, and numerous double rooms with arched fronts, each pair consisting of an inner and outer apartment, as well as vaulted stables in the rear. A fountain occupies the centre of the quadrangle, and around it, or in the broad colonnade, the merchants pile their wares in separate heaps. The scene is animated. Groups of men from distant climes are sipping their coffee, smoking their long pipes, or perhaps improving the opportunity by driving a hard bargain, which your Oriental knows so well how to do.

Khans are usually built two stories high, and are strongly constructed of stone; the staircases are at the angles of the wall, and lead to the roof of the building, which is flat. Here the travelers make their beds in the warm weather. There is not much making required, for as it consists of a mat, a sheet, and, if you are of luxurious habits, a pillow. In the morning every sleeper takes up his bed and walks down the stone staircase and out of the hospitable building, after first saying his prayers with his face towards Mecca, performing his morning ablutions, and paying a trifling gratuity to the "Khanji," or keeper of the khan, who makes his income chiefly by supplying fodder for the cattle sheltered in the edifice.

The mosques, of one of which we saw the interior, are very plain as to internal decations. There is a paved court outside, and from it a flight of steps leads to the entrance of the sacred building, which is usually about sixty feet high, and square or octagonal in form; within the court is a fountain. A curtain hangs before the doorway, and on moving this you at once find yourself in a spacious room, the floor of which is carpeted, or else, during the hot weather, covered with matting. On the walls are inscribed a few sentences from the Koran. On the side nearest Mecca is a small hollow recess, and here the orisons of the faithful are offered up. Some of the mosques have four minarets or towers, one at each angle, from whence the faithful are called to prayer. The muezzins mount to the summit of these minarets by means of a spiral staircase within the tower, and it is marvellous how far their voices can be heard in the delightful calm evenings, and amid the busy hum of the city.

We visited the principal bazaar about sunset, and found it crowded with people of different nationalities: Persians, Koords, Turks—moving gravely about in their handsome dresses—also Jews and Arabs. There were numberless coffee-houses intermingled with shops, all of which were filled with rows of guests, sitting cross-legged and smoking in dignified silence. The streets are dull and dirty, some not more than ten feet in width; and the houses on either side present only a blank wall to passers-by, with here and there a small latticed window.

The crowds of half-starved dogs, which roam about the thoroughfares and act the part of scavengers, would astonish a European. They have no masters, and occasionally snap at your legs in a vicious sort of way, eminently suggestive of hydrophobia.

The Pasha's palace is rather a dingy-looking building, with a number of soldiers loitering about it, while the barracks are dirty in the extreme. Outside the walls, extending over a tract of land that must have been formerly occupied by streets of the city, is a burying-ground. We rode out to visit it. Here in the midst, is the tomb of Zobeide, the good queen of Haroun-al-Raschid; it is in a fair state of preservation, notwithstanding the fact that it was erected more than a thousand years ago, and that the city has been sacked and burnt a score of times since.

This part of Bagdad, which is situated on the eastern bank of the Tigris, and which owes its existence to the great Caliph, is by far the larger and more important portion of the city containing the Pasha's palace, and the chief mosque, as well as the great bazaar. Crossing to the western side of the river, one day, in company with the Resident, who kindly consented to be our cicerone, we found ourselves, after a short ride on horseback, among the ruins of ancient Bagdad. A few miles beyond is a singular mound, called by the Arabs "Tell Nimrood," or the Hill of Nimrod, or more usually known as Akrarkouff. It is an enormous mass of bricks, 130 feet high, and at least 300 feet in circumference at the base, and supposed to be solid. Here this singular pile has stood for centuries, as Edmund Burke finely says, "covered with the awful hoar of innumerable ages," and, in all human probability, here it will rear its shapeless form, all worn and furrowed though it be by the storms of ages, till the world is thousands of years older. There is no record of the date of its construction, though, as its name implies, the legend is that the "mighty hunter" himself was the architect.

On our way back to dinner, as we sauntered through the streets, we watched with amusement, the bargaining between a shopkeeper and his customer, who was seated beside him on a small piece of matting inside the shop, and who, with evident satisfaction to himself, was going through the preliminary operation of smoking a pipe and drinking a cup of coffee with the individual who proposed to fleece him. However, in this instance, it was a case of "diamond cut diamond;" the customer was no "young man from the country," but coolly offered less than one-half of the price demanded for the article in question. The tradesman laughed satirically at him, and asked, in a bitter tone of sarcasm, whether he thought he (the shopkeeper) had stolen it? After a little more haggling, the inflexible customer coolly walked out of the shop. He was suffered to depart but a short distance, for the wily tradesman followed him, flourishing in his hand the handsome dyed mat, the cause of all this hard swearing. "Mashallah," he exclaimed, "you shall have it." And the dollars forthwith changed owners.

The shops are all open to the street, and are only raised a couple of feet above the pavement; hence, passing friends can converse with the inmates from the outside. The women seldom appear in the streets, except when going to pay a visit to female friends, and are always shrouded from head to foot. Naught but their eyes can be seen peering through the thin veil of white muslin or horsehair. Every house is provided with baths, which, among the higher classes, are generally constructed of marble. The Armenians form the most wealthy portion of the community, and dress very handsomely. The complexion of their women is fair, and in early womanhood they are extremely pretty, but soon grow fat, and, owing to the early marriages they contract and the sedentary lives they lead, lose their good looks and the freshness of youth when still young. The Turks, who form an important section of the upper classes, also dress handsomely. They wear monstrous turbans of muslin of every variety of color. The outer garment is ample and flowing, generally of purple or scarlet silk, and confined at the waist by a costly Cashmere shawl. Over this is thrown a loose cloak of cloth, called a "chogah," which is not suffered to conceal the hilt of a dagger ornamented with jewels. Their lower garments are loose breeches, or "pajamas," also composed of parti-colored silk. The costume is completed by shoes of bright yellow leather, with pointed toes. The Prussians dress more plainly, and their sombre appearance and restless manner afford, in a crowd, a striking contrast to the lordly and dignified Turk.

LAYING ON OF HANDS IN 1771.

A SOI-DISANT Doctor has been for some time past astonishing the weak-minded ones of San Francisco by treating all kinds of diseases simply by "laying on of hands." Marvelous cures are claimed to have been performed by the exercise of the wonderful power which he is firmly believed, by many, to possess. Some of his adherents look upon the appearance of this individual in our midst as a special blessing, and are horrified at the impiety of those who are bold enough to doubt the reality of his cures. Nearly a hundred years ago there was a painter in London of the name of Philip James de Loutherbourg, who turned his attention to curing diseases by "laying on of hands," and who was devoutly believed in by many as the possessor of miraculous powers.

Concerning this artist, who, a native of Strasbourg, had come to England in the year 1771, had been employed by Garrick to paint scenes for Drury Lane Theatre, and in 1781 had obtained the full honors of the Royal Academy—a curious fanatical pamphlet, by one Mary Pratt, of Portland street, Marylebone, was published in 1789. It was entitled, "A list of cures performed by Mr. and Mrs. de Loutherbourg, of Hammersmith Terrace, without Medicine. By a Lover of the Lamb of God," and was dedicated to the Archbishop of Canterbury in very high-flown terms. Mr. De Loutherbourg was described as "a gentleman of superior abilities, well-known in the scientific and polite assemblies for his brilliancy of talents as a philosopher and painter," who, with his wife, had been made proper recipients of the "divine manudnctions," and gifted with power "to diffuse healing to the afflicted; whether deaf, dumb, lame, halt, or blind." The Archbishop was therefore entreated to compose a form of prayer to be used in all churches and chapels, that nothing might prevent the inestimable power of the De Loutherbourgs from having its free course, and to order public thanksgiving to be offered up for the same. In her preface, Mrs. Pratt stated that her pamphlet had been published without the consent of Mr. De Loutherbourg, and that he had reprimanded her on account of it, and enjoined her positively to suppress it; but that on mature reflection she had considered it more advisable to offend an individual rather than permit thousands of her fellow-creatures to remain strangers to the precious gifts of the painter. "I judged by my own private feelings," she writes, "that had I any relative either deaf, dumb, blind, or lame, how thankful I should be to find a cure (more especially gratis); therefore I suffered the pamphlet to be sold, in hopes that by circulating these most solemn truths, many poor afflicted people might come and be healed."

The cures enumerated in Mrs. Pratt's list would be marvelous enough if the slightest credit could be attached to the lady's wild statements. In truth, De Loutherbourg had been caught by the strange empirical mania prevalent throughout Europe towards the close of the eighteenth century. He became a physician, a visionary, a prophet, and—a charlatan. The close friend of the arch-im postor Cagliostro, and the disciple of Dr. Mesmer, he took to the practice of animal magnetism, professing to cure all diseases, and avowing himself possessed of powers of vaticination and second sight. His treatment of the patients who flocked to him was undoubtedly founded on the practice of Mesmer, though Horace Walpole appears to draw a distinction between the curative methods of the two doctors, when he writes to the Countess of Ossory in July, 1789: "Loutherbourg, the painter, is turned an inspired physician, and has three thousand patients. His sovereign panacea is barley water. I believe it as efficacious as mesmerism. Baron Swedenborg's disciples multiply also. I am glad of it. The more religions and the more follies the better; they inveigle proselytes from one another." In a subsequent letter he writes, in reference to a new religion advocated by Taylor, the Platonist: "He will have no success. Not because nonsense is not suited to making proselytes—witness the Methodists, Moravians, Baron Swedenborg, and Loutherbourg the painter—but it should not be learned nonsense, which only the literate think they understand after long study. Absurdity announced only to the ear and easily retained by the memory has other guess operation. Not that I have any objection to Mr. Taylor for making proselytes; the more religions the better. If we had but two in the island they would cut one another's throats for power. When there is plenty of beliefs the professors only gain customers here and there from rival shops, and make more controversies than converts." This letter was also written to the Countess of Ossory. It was hardly in so free a vein on such a subject that the writer would have ventured to address Miss Hannah More; with whom Mr. Walpole was fond of corresponding about this period.

In Mrs. Pratt's List we read of a lad named Thomas Robinson, suffering from the King's Evil, and dismissed from St. Bartholomew's Hospital as incurable, brought before Mr. De Loutherbourg, who "admiuistered to him yesterday in the public healing-room, amidst a large concourse, among whom were some of the first families of distinction in the kingdom," and wholly cured the sufferer. The two daughters born deaf and dumb of Mrs. Hook, Stable Yard, St. James', waited upon Mrs. De Loutherbourg, "who looked upon them with an eye of benignity and healed them." "I heard them both speak," avers Mrs. Pratt, by way of settling the matter. Among other cures we find "a man with a withered arm which was useless, cured in a few minutes by Mr. De Loutherbourg in the public healing-room at Hammersmith;" "Mr. Williams, of Cranbourne Street, ill of a fever, had kept his bed ten weeks, was cured instantly;" "a green-grocer in Weymouth Street, Marylebone, next door to the Weavers' Arms, cured of lameness in both legs—went with crutches—is perfectly well;" "a Miss W—, a public vocal performer, cured,—but had not goodness of heart enough to own the cure publicly;" "a child cured of blindness, at Mr. Marsden's, cheese-monger, in the borough." Other cases are set forth; but the reader will probably consider that specimens enough have been culled from Mrs. Pratt's pamphlet.

That the proceedings of the De Loutherbourgs attracted extraordinary attention is very certain. Crowds surrounded the painter's house at Hammersmith, so that it was with difficulty he could go in or out. Particular days were set apart and advertised in the newspapers as "healing days," and a portion of the house was given up as a "healing-room." Patients were admitted to the presence of the artist-physician by tickets only, and to obtain possession of these, it is said that three thousand people were to be seen waiting at one time. Mrs. Pratt recounts "with horror and detestation" the wickedness of certain speculators in the crowd, who, having procured tickets gratis, unscrupulously sold them, at a profit ranging from two to five guineas, to buyers who were tired of waiting. De Loutherbourg complained bitterly that out of the thousands he professed to have cured, but few returned to thank him for the great benefits he had conferred upon them. He preferred to believe in the ingratitude of his patients rather than adopt the more obvious and reasonable course of questioning the perfect virtue of his curative powers. Mrs. Pratt in concluding her pamphlet entreats the magistracy or governors of the police to wait on Mr. De Loutherboug and consult with him as to a proper mode of promoting his labours, and suggests that a "Bethesda" should be forthwith built for the reception of the sick, and that officers should be appointed to preserve decorum, and to facilitate the efforts of Mr. and Mrs. De Loutherbourg "without so much crowding." Finally she exhorts the world at large to contribute generously to the promotion of these beneficial objects.

But even at the date of Mrs. Pratt's pamphlet the tide was turning—had turned. The nine day's wonder was over. The mania was dying of exhaustion. Incidentally, the lady relater that "having suffered all the indignities and contumely that man could suffer," the inspired physician had for a time retired from practice into the country. "I have heard," she continues, "people curse him and threaten his life, instead of returning him thanks." In truth, as the public credulity waned, the doctors' cures failed. His labors were of no avail; his prophecies were falsified. His patients rose against him; the duped grew desperate; the mob became exceeding wrath. The house in Hammersmith Terrace was attacked; stones were thrown, and windows smashed. Not much further mischief was done, however. De Loutherbourg and his wife prudently withdrew from public observation; quitted the kingdom. They were next heard of in company with their friend Count Cagliostro in Switzerland: Madame Cagliostro having accompanied them in their journey from England. But Count Cagliostro's career of jugglery and fraud was nearly over. On the night of the 27th December, 1789, he was arrested in Rome, and shut up in the Castle of St. Angelo, whence he never emerged again alive.

In the curious and scarce "Life and Adventures of Joseph Balsamo, commonly called Count Cagliostro," translated from the Italian, and published in London in 1791, copies are given of certain strange papers found in his possession, concerning which he was examined by the Inquisition during his imprisonment. In one of these documents there is unquestionable reference to De Loutherbourg, though the painter's name is not given at length, and appears surrounded by the jargon of Cagliastro's so-called system of Egyptian Free-masonry, of which it is not possible to render any satisfactory interpretation. We extract from the paper the following:

On the twentieth day of the eighth month—

The Grand Master being employed in his operations, after the usual ceremonies, the Pupil, before seeing the Angel, said: "I find myself in a dark room.

"I see a golden sword suspended over my head.

"I perceive Louth—g arrive.

"He opens his breast and shows a wound in his heart; he holds out a poinard to me."

Grand Master.—"Is he employed in the service of the Grand Cophete?"

Pupil.—"Yes."

G. M.—"What else do you see?"

P.—"I see a star.

"I see two.

"I see seven."

G. M.—"Proceed."

P.—"Louth—g has retired—the scene changes—I see seven angels," etc., etc.

Cagliostro was ordered by the Inquisition to explain the meaning of this paper. He professed the profoundest ignorance as to its purport. There will probably be no great harm in concluding, therefore, that it did not possess meaning of any kind. But the reader is left to form his own opinion on the subject.

Soon De Loutherbourg was found to be again in England. But he practiced no more as an inspired physician; he now followed sedulously his legitimate profession. His eccentricities and escapades were overlooked; it seems to have been agreed that he had been more fool than knave—that he had imposed upon himself quite as much as upon other people. He was permitted to resume his old place in society, and soon painted himself into public favor again. He died on the 11th March, 1812, at his house in Hammersmith Terrace, and was buried in Chiswick Church-yard, near the grave of William Hogarth.

LITTLE RIE—A DOMESTIC SKETCH.

BY JEAN INGELOW.

RIE was a poor outcast who had been sheltered by an old woman, kind, yet stern, and Rie who never had been taught anything, did not always speak the truth. The very first day little Rie went with her new mistress she got into trouble. She was told to hold out her pianofore while the mistress counted apples into it for a pudding; the pianofore was not half full when the mistress was called away, and then little Rie, left alone, looking at all the bright, rosy apples, laying in rows on the low shelf, found the temptation too great for her, and bit one of them, which she hastily returned to its place. When the mistress came back and found the little culprit, with cheeks suffused with crimson, and head hanging down, she easily discovered what had happened, and then in spite of her promises that she would be good, she was summarily punished and put to bed.

"She is but a child," said Sally.

"She is a naughty child," said the mistress, "and it is just she should be punished."

"Yes, ma'am," Sally ventured to say, "only somehow if you're angry when you do it, won't she think you don't love her!"

"Dear me, Sally, how foolish you are. I don't want her to think I love her when she is naughty, but only when she is good."

"Oh, don't you, ma'am?" replied Sally, doubtfully. Well, ma'am, no doubt but you know best?"

"It must be just," continued the mistress; "she shall be indulged when she's good, but I shall never overlook it when she is naughty."

The mistress was as good as her word; and as little Rie was often naughty in her childish way, it followed that she was often punished, till once seeing her dear Sally crying after the mistress had been more than usually angry, she climbed up her knee and made many protestations that she never would be naughty any more, and make Sally cry.

Poor little Rie, she had her troubles; but she loved Sally dearly; and perhaps, child as she was, she had sometimes, when the rain was pouring down, and the wind howling outside, a dim perception that she had saved from a dreary, toilsome, and evil life, and it was strangely better to sit with Sally in the cheerful kitchen, and hear the rosebuds tapping, than to wander up and down those everlengthening roads, cold and hungry and neglected. And now she had been very good for a long time; and by consequence, she was very happy, and the time passed very rapidly, till all the snow had melted away and the garden was full of crocuses and snowdrops; it seemed only a few days and they were over; and she could watch the rosebuds coming out; and then it seemed a very little time longer before Sally was constantly telling her to pick the rose leaves up and throw them out, when they drifted in at the window.

At last, one day, one sorrowful day, the mistress came into the kitchen to make a raisin pudding, while she sent Sally and little Rie to the shop, and during their absence she twisted up some few raisins in a paper and laid them on the dresser, intending to give them to the child when she came in. But Sally came in very late; and when she laid a rabbit and papers of sugar, rice, and tea on the table, and then proceeded to count out eggs and produce, apples and other good things, the mistress forgot the raisins, and pushed back her flour and all her apparatus, to make room for the groceries. Sally was not a good accountant, and she had scarcely made out the price of each article and produced the change, when some friends came to see the mistress, and she went into the parlor.

When they were gone, she remembered her intended present and came back into the kitchen; she moved every parcel and every dish, searched the dresser, and looked on the floor, but the paper of raisins was not to be found, it was gone.

"Come here, little Rie," she said gravely: "did you see a paper of raisins on the table when you came home?"

"Yes, ma'am," said the child, whose two small hands were closely clasped behind her.

"And do you know what has become of them?"

"No, I don't—I'm sure I don't," replied the child, and her delicate neck and face became suffused with crimson.

"Oh, my dear!" exclaimed Sally, "if she'll speak the truth, I know missis won't be so angry with her. O, she will speak the truth, I know."

"I did, I did," cried the child, with an outbreak of passionate tears.

Sally upon this searched the floor and tables, and nothing could be clearer than that the raisins were not there. Alas! they could not doubt that she had eaten them, for she had been left alone in the kitchen for a few minutes, and Sally herself admitted that they could not have gone without hands.

"Now, if you will speak the truth," said the mistress, gravely, "and confess that you took those raisins."——

"I didn't," repeated the child, now too much in a passion to care what she said. "I don't want the nasty raisins, and I won't have them."

"Oh, this will never do," said the mistress; "Sally, I really must correct her?"

"Will she tell it all?" said Sally, once more stooping over the child, for she had flung herself on the floor, and was sobbing and screaming. But no, little Rie would only struggle and fight her, till at another bidding she went with a sorrowful heart to fetch a rod, and when she came back she found the child in such a passion, that she ventured to remonstrate, though she still hurriedly looked about with the vague hope that she might have spoken the truth after all.

Poor little Rie, she was so very naughty. Sally was the more grieved, because lately she had always spoken the truth; but now, when an hour after her punishment, the mistress came in again, and offered to forgive her on condition of her speaking the truth, she sullenly walked into the corner, and sobbed and would not say a word.

"Then, Sally, you must go these errands by yourself," said the mistress; "I meant to have let her go with you, but now she must stay here by herself."

Little Rie looked up as she went away, and saw that she was very stern and angry. O, how little either of them thought they should never look one another in the face again.

Sally went away. It was a precious afternoon, and the kitchen door leading into the back garden was open. Little Rie was at first disconsolate, but soon the light spirits of childhood began to assert themselves, and she began to play, though very quietly, and with an occasional sob, till at last, O woeful mischance, she knocked down a cheese-plate. It fell clattering upon the floor, and broke into fifty pieces; one moment she stood aghast! then her terrified fancy feigned a step upon the stairs; she darted through the open door and rushed down the garden. Where she should go to escape the anger of the mistress, she scarcely knew; but she came to the garden wicket, it led into a lane. * * * She ran away, and no one knew what became of her.

There was a man who said, some time afterward, that he met her that night, about sundown, wandering over the moor, but he had asked her no question, for he thought some of her friends must be near at hand. In the course of time many rumors were about expecting her, but nothing was ever known. Little Rie "was not;" she had vanished from her place like a dream. * * * But weeks after, when poor Sally's simple heart was getting used to miss the child, the mistress came into the kitchen and took down a little covered jar full of caraway seeds, from a shelf over the dresser; she looked in, and a mist seemed to rise and shut out the sunshine without and within, for there lay the paper of raisins; in an instant she knew it again, and knew that in her hurry and confusion, she herself must have thrown it in. Yes, that little jar had been standing beside her. Then into it she must have pushed, or dropped the raisins, and afterward, with her own hands, she must have set the jar upon the shelf above to be out of her way.

Miserable, aching pain! How hard it was to have it tugging at her heart, and by slow degrees to grow into the knowledge that even a just punishment may become unjust unless it is administered in the spirit of love. But hers had not been a just punishent. Alas! she mhad not possessed herself of any knowledge of the fault; she herself had outraged that sense of justice which she had been at so much pains to implant; and now there was no means of making restitution. How difficult it is to estimate the many ways in which we may be mistaken! When shall we learn to keep the knowledge always present with us, that often kindness is our best uprightness, and our truest justice is mercy?

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1866.

BLACK SHEEP.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued in to-day's CALIFORNIAN.

M. RENAN AND HIS CRITICS.

TO those timorous souls who have been accustomed to regard the author of La Vie de Jesus and Les Apotres as a malignant and ruthless assailant of traditional Christianity, a subtle sapper of the faith on which depend the salvation of souls and the well being of society, it must be somewhat surprising to learn that his most remorseless critics have been those who accuse him of reposing, not too little, but too much faith in the reliability of the New Testament narratives. Yet such is the fact. While the Papal hierarchy, and the learned evangelical doctors have attacked him with all the weapons their respective armories could furnish, as the most incredulous as well as the most monstrous of skeptics, the great authorities of true skepticism on the other hand repudiate him as being altogether too superstitious for fellowship in their communion. Indeed, it is both curious and edifying to observe how precisely, in certain respects, their method of dealing with M. Renan's "histories," resembles the method used by him in dealing with the gospel biographies.

One of this class of critics, reviewing Les Apotres in the Westminster, rebukes the author for allowing any historical character at all to the gospel narratives, and for not rejecting them altogether as mere "legendary tales." "Our office," says the reviewer, ("a thankless task which we attempt only in the paramount interest of historical truth) is to show that M. Renan's self styled history is based on assumptions, and is throughout full of inconsistencies and contradictions." This may be a just statement of the character of the work in question; indeed it is precisely our own conviction, but it nevertheless seems rather shabby treatment for M. Renan to receive at the hands of the most thorough going foes of Christianity, who ought, one would imagine, to look upon him as an ally not to be despised.

The fact is, however, that Renan's "sentimentalism" seems as offensive and as silly to the cold-blooded materialistic class of atheists of the Moleschott and Buchner schools, as the "superstition" of old-fashioned believers does to the eloquent Frenchman; and it must be admitted that they have shown pretty conclusively that his "histories" have even less claim to the historical character than he is disposed to allow to the Evangelists. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to whether M. Renan has succeeded in demolishing the New Testament, there can be no doubt as to the complete success that has attended the efforts of the materialistic critics to demolish his singularly fanciful and poetical biographies.

But when we have agreed with the critics so far as to depose the books of M. Renan from our historical shelf, and consign them to the companionship of works of the imagination, like the legends of Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table, what are we to do next? Are we to return to the old faith, or to accept the hand offered us by the victorious iconoclast of superstitions and sentimentalisms, and follow with docile steps while he conducts us to that "mountain top of thought"—his own stand-point—from which we look abroad upon the spectacle of a universe all whose phenomena are the result of "a fortuitous concourse of atoms" in eternal action, forever combining and dissolving, without beginning and without end—a universe in which there is no such thing as mind or spirit except as modes of speech—no gods but Force and Matter—no form of being, no mode of sentient activity that was not evolved from nebula, and that will not be again resolved into nebula—no reality in short, but "Infinite Dust?"

But we are in danger of becoming "sentimental"—the one unpardonable sin according to the creed of a Westminster reviewer. Let us restrain ourselves therefore, and endeavor to maintain the strictly critical frame of mind of the philosopher who has learned to regard all enthusiasm as childish, and all emotion as an evidence of nervous debility; who finds nothing in thought but phosphorus, and refers hope and fear, the exhilaration of joy and the horror of despair, to the state of the digestion and the condition of the liver. It being settled that M. Renan's theory of the life of Jesus is to be cast aside as "based on assumptions," and "throughout full of inconsistencies and contradictions," the reviewer warns us that his work is done. His business was to destroy, not to build up, and we are not to look to him for a more consistent theory. Indeed, he holds that no satisfactory theory is possible, for lack of reliable data, the gospel narratives being utterly trustworthy, and the alleged facts so improbable that no amount of evidence can warrant belief in them. "No amount of wisdom or learning," he more curtly than elegantly declares, "can reconcile absolute contradictions, or make that to have taken place which has never happened." This arrogant style of assuming, in regard to the very facts, or alleged facts, the truth of which is the point in dispute, that they "never happened," seems scarcely less dogmatic than the "divination" with which M. Renan is charged.

The latter, starting with the existence and career of Christianity as facts to be accounted for, and with the New Testament writings, as ancient documents to be examined, weighed, and estimated by the same methods as other ancient writings, forms a theory of the life of Jesus, more or less plausible, using as a test to decide whether he obtains true results, the harmony and probability of the narrative as finally constructed. He says substantially, Christianity is a great fact, and it must be accounted for in some way. That such a person as Jesus of Nazareth lived, and founded this system, there can be no doubt. The original documents contain many touches of nature, many minute intrinsic evidences of truth, which forbid the idea that they are fabrications. But they also contain absolute contradictions, as in the details of the different narratives of the resurrection. They also contain incredible prodigies. The way then to deal with these biographies, is neither to reject them as fabrications, nor to accept them as true throughout. We must harmonize the naratives where they are contradictory, and throw aside the prodigies, which abound in all ancient writings. In short, he insists that in histories like the Gospels, "Where the outline alone is certain, and all the details are rendered more or less doubtful by the legendary character of the documents, some hypothesis is indispensable."

Such is M. Renan's idea of the method of constructing a true, or at least a probable life of Jesus. The reviewer on the other hand insists that there are no materials for constructing it, and that all attempts of the kind are idle. "We deny altogether," he declares, "that in the effort to make the great souls of the past live again, some share of conjecture and divination must be permitted. If there remain but a single trait in their character, or a single incident in their lives for which we have adequate contemporary evidence, conjecture is needless, for here we have knowledge; if that evidence is lacking, divination is worthless, for it can only end in evoking a phantom."

Of the critics who make their attack from the orthodox stand-point, we have no space to speak at present. It is noticeable, however, that the majority of them quite abandon the tone in which ten or fifteen years ago theologians would have dealt with such a writer as M. Renan. They recognize the legitimacy of such investigations as he attempts on the part of all who like the author of "Ecce Homo," find themselves "dissatisfied with the current conceptions of the character of Christ," and they do not seem to consider the quotation of a text an unanswerable argument.

One excellent effect of the discussions that have grown out of books of the kind in question, is the check that has been given to that narrow and literal spirit of bibliolatry, which has too long been considered a necessary element of Christianity. These discussions have done much to teach the mass of intelligent believers to discriminate the substance of religion from its forms, and to prepare them to abandon many dogmas that they have been accustomed to consider indispensable parts of their creed without becoming infidels.

For whatever of earnest and honest hostility to Christianity exists, is the reaction of intelligence and independence against the narrowness which bigotted dogmatists have succeeded in stamping upon the popular conceptions of religion; and the ignorant fanaticism of pious and passionate defenders, have done more to diminish the power of the Church than all the learning and subtlety of its most formidable assailants. The great lesson that Christians of this age have to learn, is how much of what they have been accustomed to believe can be given up without a sacrifice of anything essential to the power and life of religion.

CARELESS CRITICISM.—A critic more savage than conscientious, makes the following unfair thrust at Miss Braddon, in the New York Weekly Review: "In the first paragraph of Miss Braddon's new novel, Birds of Prey—the title of which was doubtless suggested by a chapter in Our Mutual Friend—that great representative of kitchen-girl taste in fiction makes a characteristic blunder, representing several children as playing at "hop-scotch" on "door-steps." The "blunder" is not Miss Braddon's, but her hasty censor's. She does not represent the boys as playing hop-scotch on door-steps, but in front of them—or, rather, as being so awed by the imposing appearance of said "spotless" door-steps as to shrink from them "as from a shrine too sacred for hop-scotch." Her meaning is obvious enough, and were it otherwise the point is too trifling for criticism.

STRAYING INTO POLITICS.

FOR several weeks prior to the recent elections, a number of influential Republican papers at the East disgraced themselves by attempting to persuade Irish voters sympathizing with the Fenian movement, that they had been foully outraged because they were prevented by the action of President Johnson from founding a foreign government upon American soil, and were compelled to respect those just laws which forbid private citizens to organize military expeditions against friendly powers. The propriety and necessity of such laws have never been questioned by any civilized State, nor have they ever been disputed, so far as we are aware, by any respectable organ of public opinion in this country, except the Sacramento Union. In the issue of that paper of the 17th instant, appeared a very remarkable leader, entitled "The Fenian Raid," in which the proposition was boldly stated that in consequence of the violation of the neutrality laws by England during the late rebellion, President Johnson ought to have winked at a similar violation by our own citizens on the occasion of the Fenian raid against Canada. In an article entitled "Demagogism" in the last number of THE CALIFORNIAN, we said:

"One of the most disgusting illustrations of the lengths to which leading politicians and journals are willing to go in the teeth of knowledge and conscience, in their attempts to win votes for their party, is furnished by the language held by many of them in reference to the Fenian raid upon Canada. Every man of sufficient intelligence to justify him in the expression of an opinion concerning public affairs, knows that it was President Johnson's simple duty to pursue the course he did in reference to the movement. No class of citizens or of foreigners residing in the United States have any right to make our soil the base of hostile operations against a Power with which we are at peace. The attempt to do so is an insult to the sovereignty of our laws, and the expectation that the Government can look on without interference is preposterous."

Commenting upon this, the Union, after administering a mild rebuke to THE CALIFORNIAN for the presumption which it had evinced by "straying from literature into politics," indulged in the following extraordinary strain of criticism:

"We say that the course pursued by Johnson toward the Fenians involved a treachery equal to that displayed in dealing with the Confederates and the Union party; that it was unworthy of any public man and derogatory to his character as a President, * * * * *

There is another point to be considered. Why was President Johnson so anxious to enforce the laws framed to prevent expeditions against a friendly Power being fitted out on American soil? * * * Would it have cost him a greater pang to practically suspend the neutrality laws than it does to nullify the provisions of the Civil Rights Act? The people were in favor of such a suspension. There is no doubt of the fact. And why was such a disposition to wink at the violation of the law manifested? Because, during our day of trouble, England's neutrality had been a cloak for outrage; because, under cover of neutrality, that perfidious Power had been the close ally of the Southern Confederacy, and had encouraged and facilitated the destruction of our commerce. The world is not old enough, nor sufficiently advanced in culture, to feel like adopting the Christian precept of returning good for evil. The silver rule of doing unto others as others do unto you is far more potential among the nations than the golden rule of doing unto others as you would have others do unto you. This nation, smarting under a sense of wrong, was anxious to call England to account. * * * Under these circumstances, the Fenian raid upon Canada was not likely to be regarded as a trespass upon the territory of a friendly Power, and the fact was that the people expected to get even with an enemy through this irregular channel."

It is a sad thing to find journals of the recognized standing of the Union stooping to a line of argument which would be disgraceful even in a stump speaker, and appealing without a blush, to the most vulgar passions, and the narrowest prejudices of the multitude. And when the daily partisan organs manifest a disposition so entirely to ignore principle in the discussion of great questions, we think it highly desirable that journals occupying a position independent of all parties, and that need not shrink from judging public men and public measures by a somewhat higher code than that acknowledged by the wire-pullers who manipulate municipal elections, should make it a point to "stray into politics" as often as circumstances will permit.

THE NEW YORK Nation remarks that the country districts seem to have been much shocked by the election of Mr. John Morrissey to the Fortieth Congress, and expresses the hope that "they will keep their indignation alive for a month or two, and show enough of it to force their representatives into expelling that gentleman from the House of Representatives whenever he takes his seat." It adds: "If he is allowed to sit, Congress will disgrace itself and disgrace us all; and there need be no difficulty in getting rid of him. The House need have no hesitation in resolving that an ex-convict, or the keeper of a gambling hell is an unfit person to sit in Congress; turn him out under resolution."

AT A recent sale at auction of a private library in the city of New York, a copy of Irving's Life of Washington, in five volumes, extended to ten volumes, illustrated by 1,200 inserted plates, brought $200 per volume, or $2,400 for the set. The illustrations comprised 145 different portraits of Washington. A copy of the first "New York Directory" brought $100.

THE OWL.

An owl looked forth from his hollow tree,
Where he sang "tuwhit-tuwhoo,"
And he gazed abroad on the works of men,
And the wondrous things they do.

What trouble and haste in their transient race—
How busy the creatures are;
To toil and sweat through their threescore years,
Oppressed with sorrow and care.

Quoth the owl, "My tree is a very good house
From whence I can gaze about:
Yet men ceaseless strive, and only to live,
But I live, much better without.

"Their bodies go by through the churchyard gate,
Beneath my old hollow tree,
And here," quoth the owl, "their work is done—
The end of their journey we see."

A soul in the churchyard waited and heard
The owl's "tuwhit-tuwhoo,"
And it whispered low to the foolish bird—
"Oh, owl! and what do you know?

"Your wings are feathers, and feathers are dust,
But souls of the men you see
Have wings, that mount through infinite space
To life that forever shall be.

"While waters shall flow, and winds may blow,
Men follow life's cycles round;
But soul is the man and flesh but a robe
We lay away in the ground." ***

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

THE NEW VERSION OF HOMER.

Sir JOHN HERSCHEL'S new translation of the Iliad into English hexameters is well spoken of by the critics generally. Why Sir John should have selected this measure, when he expresses so much admiration for the heroic verse, or why, indeed, he should have troubled himself to make a new version of the Iliad at all, seems not a little puzzling when he assures the reader in his preface that he regards Pope's translation as "one of the most magnificent, if not the most magnificent poem extant." Our readers are probably familiar with the famous night scene as rendered by Pope in regard to which there has been so much controversy among the critics, some pronouncing it a marvel of sublimity and beauty, while others, Coleridge and Wordsworth among the number, declare it to be a piece of unmitigated bathos, a mere collection of high-sounding words destitute of coherency, and conveying no poetical idea whatever. Here is Sir John Herschel's version:

"All night long with elated heart in the lines of their battles
Rested the Trojans, and many a fire blazed brightly among them
As when round the glowing moon, resplendent in ether,
Shines forth the heavenly host, and the air reposes in stillness,
Gleams every pointed rock, stands forth each buttress in prospect,
Shimmers each woodland vale; and from realms of unspeakable glory.
Op'ning the stars are revealed, and the heart of the shepherd rejoices.
Such and so many the fires, by the Trojans kindled, illumined
Eddying Zanthus' stream and the ships and the walls of the city.
Each of a thousand blazing piles saw seated around it
Fifty warriors of Troy, enjoying its warmth and its splendor;
While beside them their steeds, on white spelt feeding and barley,
Each to his chariot shackled, awaited the coming of morning."

THE SHAKSPEARE CONTROVERSY.

It seems that the "Young Man of Genius" alluded to in Hawthorne's preface to Miss Delia Bacon's "Philosophy of Shakspeare's Plays Unfolded," as an enthusiastic believer in her theory, is William Douglas O'Conner of Masschusetts, who has written many noticeable stories for the monthlies. He is also the author of a curious novel entitled Harrington, published in 1860, the hero of which—a student and scholar—is represented as a firm believer in the theory more recently advocated by Judge Holmes. A correspondent of the New York Round Table, sends to that paper a number of extracts from this forgotten novel, of which the following is the most striking; it is a part of a conversation, and the hero speaks:

"Set aside the evidence we might collect from his writings, and consider only what must inevitably have followed from the nature of his intellect. The complex catholicity, the massive breadth—in a word, the universality of his mind, inevitably involves a corresponding vastness of interest and participation in the public affairs of his time, and all the varieties of its thought and life. Isolation from public life may co-exist and be perfectly compatible with intensity of genius—with universality never. Moreover, to be worldly wise, as the plays show their author to have been, a man must follow the rule Bacon insists upon as indispensable—namely, to ally contemplation with action. Deny such a man experience, and you cannot get the lessons of experience, as you get them from this author. Isolate such a man from affairs, and his genius spreads aloft into the vast abstract, and you never get in his writings the voices of the street, the camp, the court, the cabinet—in a word, the voice of concrete practical life—as you do in the Shakespeare drama. Take, for example, the man nearest Shakespeare, the many sided Goethe; the corollary to his many sidedness is the fact that he was a man of the world, a scientifician, courtier, and statesman. So with the author of the drama. He must have been immersed in public life. He must have held office. He must have administered the affairs of state. It was the inevitable result of his genius, and it was the condition on which the manifestation of that genius depended. Denied public life, and either his development would have been arrested, or he would have become a vast dreamer or abstractionist."

In a note, the author speaking in his own person, says:

"The reader of the twelfth chapter of this book may already have observed that Harrington, if he had lived, would have been a believer in the theory regarding the origin and purpose of the Shakespeare drama, as developed in the admirable work by Miss Delia Bacon, entitled The Philosophy of Shakespeare's Plays Unfolded, in which belief I should certainly agree with Harrington. I wish it were in my power to do even the smallest justice to that mighty and eloquent volume, whose masterly comprehension and insight, though they could not save it from being trampled upon by the brutal bison of the British literary press, yet lift it to the dignity, whatever may be its faults, of being the best work ever composed upon the Baconian or Shakespearean writings. It has been scouted by the critics as the product of a distempered ideality. Perhaps it is. But there is a prudent wisdom, says Goethe, and there is a wisdom which does not remind us of prudence; and, in like manner, I may say that there is a sane sense, and there is a sense that does not remind us of sanity. At all events, I am assured that the candid and ingenuous reader Miss Bacon wished for will find it more to his profit to be insane with her on the subject of Shakespeare, than sane with Dr. Johnson.

"I am aware that, in even making this acknowledgment, I do something to excite the rancor of the stupid and senseless prejudice which finds no difficulty in assigning the noblest works of the human genius to the fat peasant of Stratford—a man who, as Emerson justly says, lived a profane and vulgar life, and whose biography, collected after the painful labors of more than a century, does not present a single point which bears any relation to, or correspondence with, the holy and heroic pages which bear his name; while, at the same time, this prejudice derides as a mad and monstrous impossibility the theory which ascribes those pages to Lord Bacon and his compeers—men in whose lives and careers all the Shakespearean conditions are fulfilled, and all the Shakespeareralities included."

The London Spectator publishes a poem entitled "The Session of the Poets," containing some amusing hits at English literary celebrities. The author of the recent volume which the Bulletin is pleased to characterize as a book of "unclean poems," comes in for the following:

"What was said? what was done? was there prosing or rhyming?
Was nothing noteworthy in deed or in word?
Why just as the hour of the supper was chiming.
The only event of the evening occurred,
Up jumped, with his neck stretching out like a gander,
Master Swinburne, and squealed, glaring out through his hair,
'All virtue is hosh! Hallelujah for Landor!'
I disbelieve wholly in everything there!'

"With language so awful he dared then to treat 'em,
Miss Ingelow fainted in Tennyson's arms,
Poor Arnold rushed out, crying 'Sœcl' infelcum!'
And great bards and small bards were full of alarms,
Till Tennyson, flaming and red as a gipsy,
Struck his fist on the table and uttered a shout;
'To the door with the boy! Call a cab! He is tipsy!'
And they carried the naughty young gentleman out.

"After that all the pleasanter talking was done there—
Who ever had known such an insult before?
The chairman tried hard to rekindle the fun there,
But the Muses were shocked and the pleasure was o'er.
Then 'Ah!' cried the chairman, 'this teaches me knowledge,
The future shall find me more wise, by the powers!
This comes of assigning to younkers from college
Too early a place in such meetings as ours!'

OUR GREATEST POET.

The New York Nation, in a recent notice of the "New Biglow Papers," expresses the opinion that Emerson, Bryant, Longfellow, and Lowell, occupy the four highest places among American poets, and assigns the precedence to Lowell. Very wisely the Nation furnishes no reason for this literary dictum, saying: "We do not propose to prove here (what we nevertheless hold to be not difficult of proof) that of all these writers he may be rated, all things considered, as the first." Nothing can be more easy (or more useless) than to deliver ex cathedra judgments of this sort. When a journal of the grade of the Nation undertakes to reverse generally accepted literary decisions, one naturally looks for some idication, at least, of the grounds upon which it proceeds. When Edgar A. Poe, some twenty-five years ago, puplished his series of ingenious papers in Graham's Magazine, on the "American Poets," in which he claimed for Lowell a higher rank than for Longfellow, neither Evangeline, the Golden Legend, nor Hiawatha, upon which the reputation of the poet will chiefly rest, had been published.

MISCELLANEOUS.

This year has seen the expiration of the copyright of Lord Byron's works in England, and is also witnessing the attempt now being made in London to raise a fund to secure from neglect and ruin the tomb of the poet. It will be remembered that the clerical authorities of Westminster Abby refused to allow him a place in the poets' corner there, and his remains now rest in a dilapadated Nottinghamsbire village church, the spot being marked only by a simple marble slab.

Little could the author of Childe Harrold have anticipated in the day of his ascendancy, that in less than fifty years from the time of his death, a subscription would have to be undertaken to rescue his burial place from being forgotten; still less, that Wordsworth at whom he sneered, would, before the lapse of a moiety of that period, be ranked far above him as a poet, in the judgment of the great republic of letters, and that others whom he patronized, would exert a far more enduring influence upon English literature.

Mrs. Stowe and Mrs. Maria L. Childe are both writing novels to be published by Ticknor & Fields. The same firm will soon issue a new volume of poems by Emerson. Holmes is said to be busy with his new novel, to be published as a serial in the Atlantic Monthly, to commence in the January number. The name of the new magazine, to be edited in Boston, and published in New York, about which so much has been said for some months past, is to be Genial Words—not a very felicitous title, as it strikes us. Though spoken of as a "magazine," it is to be published weekly.

Tennyson has a new volume of poems in readiness to be published early in the new year.

Jean Ingelow has tried her hand at novel writing. Her book is nearly ready, and will be published simultaneously in England and the United States.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editors of The Californian cannot engage to furnish answers to interrogatories propounded in this department. They will be glad, however, to publish replies supplied by correspondents.]

ART CRITICISM IN SAN FRANCISCO.

I WAS about to commence this paper with the remark that the "art criticism" furnished to the public of San Francisco, in its daily papers, is singularly unedifying. But upon a moment's consideration I am inclined to substitute the contradictory proposition, that it is singularly edifying, inasmuch as it teaches a number of very curious lessons—albeit none of them are strictly german to the matter with which such criticism professes to deal, or are calculated to furnish sound notions of the particular works which are its subjects.

One of these lessons is, that it is impossible for hack writers, who have no knowledge of art, to write judiciously and intelligently concerning it, no matter how much versatility and dexterity they may possess as general writers for the press upon all subjects and at the shortest notice.

Another is, that in order two or more individuals may to intelligently agree in their judgments (and the grounds of the same) of a picture, a statue, or a piece of architecture, they must possess minute and thorough information in regard to the subject matter of the judgment, and also of the principles and standard by which it is to be estimated. Now, as a general rule, the persons who write the "notices" of pictures and other works of art, as well as of musical and dramatic entertainments, and of books, for the daily press in this country possess no thorough knowledge on any subject. They are ready superficial men; often of a fair share of intelligence and general culture, but with none in any special direction, having too great a variety of duties to discharge to render it possible for them to perform any thoroughly and well. Hence they pass snap judgments, dogmatize, generalize, or deal in non-committal phrases which have no positive significance, or in hazy and grandiloquent rhetoric that imposes upon the ignorant, and passes for fine writing. It has been truly said, harsh as it may sound, that "complete knowledge of anything worth knowing is the most scarce of American productions; for complete knowledge is the result of attentive study and patient thought;" and of course there is no leisure for these, except as applicable to "business" of one sort or another in a society like ours. The very idea of a young (or middle aged) gentleman upon whom devolves the various duties of "noticing" amusements, books, pictures, new buildings, etc., for a daily paper bestowing "attentive study and patient thought" upon such trifling matters, is of course preposterous.

If criticism is to influence art, or if art is ever to be improved by criticism, the critic must possess at least as thorough a knowledge of the principles and theory of art as the artist himself, though not of course the executive skill. He must also possess sufficient artist-feeling to enable him to view a work from the artist's stand-point. In addition to this, inasmuch as a very important part of criticism consists of judicious comparison, the critic needs a familiar acquaintance with all the works of acknowledged merit that have been preserved, and the peculiar excellencies and defects of each. It is only the critic who is thoroughly furnished for his work in this way, and who can render a distinct and intelligible reason for every judgment he pronounces, who can be free from the influence of ephemeral fashions, capricious popularity, or of great names. If he is not thoroughly indoctrinated in the principles of art and familiar with its masterpieces, his opinions of particuler works will be governed by considerations entirely apart from their intrinsic merits, and he will be too timid or too uncertain of himself to dare to offend the reigning taste, or to dream of such an enterprise as the attempt to overthrow a reputation established upon a false basis, and obtained only by pandering to the taste of an ignorant public.

THE SONG OF THE RIVER.

I.

CLEAR and cool, clear and cool,
By laughing shallow, and dreaming pool:
Cool and clear, cool and clear,
By shining shingle, and foaming weir;
Under the crag where the ouzel sings,
And the ivied wall where the church bell rings,
Undefiled, for the undefiled;
Play by me, bathe in me, mother and child!

II.

Dank and foul, dank and foul,
By the smoke-grimed town in its murky cowl;
Foul and dank, foul and dank,
By wharf and sewer and slimy bank;
Darker and darker the further I go,
Baser and baser the richer I grow;
Who dare sport with the sin-defiled?
Shrink from me, bathe in me, mother and child!

III.

Strong and free, strong and free,
The floodgates are open, away to the sea.
Free and strong, free and strong,
Cleansing my streams as I hurry along,
To the golden sands and the leaping bar,
And the taintless tide that awaits me afar,
As I lose myself in the infinite main,
Undefiled, for the undefiled;
Play by me, bathe in me, mother and child!

CHARLES KINGSLEY.

WILD MR. WILL—A CHRISTMAS STORY.

A CHRISTMAS party was gathered round a fire—a leaping, roaring, jovial coal-fire—and indulging in the orthodox amusement of story-telling. We had an ancient housekeeper among us, who had known some of us ever since we were born, and the papas and mammas of many others of us a long time before we were born.

"Ah!" remarked this ancient dame, when one of our stories—I think it was a ghost story—had come to a conclusion—"it's all very easy to talk, but I suppose there are other persons who have seen strange things—ay, and can tell strange things about 'em, too. It isn't for nothing that I lived seven years and three months in the service of my Lord Millamant."

"I knew his lordship well, I observed, "that is, I have seen his portrait in the print-shops, and read of his achievements in the newspapers when I was a boy. He ran away with and married Miss Jaghire, the great Indian heiress, didn't he?"

"Yes, sir, he did."

"He killed Sir Hargreaves Grimwood, the West Country baronet, in a duel about Lady Grimwood, didn't he? I remember his trial and acquittal as though they had occurred yesterday."

"Yes, sir, he did; but he was badly provoked. Sir Hargreaves was a sad man—lived at the Brimstone Coffee House, and always drank a pint of Schiedam before breakfast. He wasn't the first tall gentleman who had been shot about Lady Grimwood."

"And he died ambassador at Madrid, didn't he?"

"Yes, sir; but that was long after I left his service. It is full forty years ago that I was housekeeper to the Right Honorable the Earl of Millamant, Lord Lieutenant of Darkshire, at Cartfoil House, Hay Hill, Berkeley square."

"And was it there you became acquainted with any strange tale?"

The housekeeper nodded significantly.

"What may it have been about, now—love?"

"Not a bit of it," replied the housekeeper; "could never abide love, and wouldn't trouble my head about such nonsense. No, it wasn't the least in the world about love."

"Murder, now?" I hinted.

"Worse!" said the housekeeper, emphatically.

"Worse!" I repeated. "What can be worse?" I might have suggested fire, thieves, suicide, elopement; but I thought murder would cover a multitude of crimes.

"I see you are all dying of curiosity to know about it, and I won't keep you any longer in suspense. Besides, the story's a very short one. It was hushed up at the time, and it would have been much more than my place was worth to breathe a word of it to a living soul. But the chief people concerned in it are all dead. The very dog was poisoned by the butcher the day afterward, as if, poor dumb creature, he could have wagged a tail to compromise anybody."

"But we haven't heard who the dog was, or the butcher either," I broke in, I am afraid, somewhat impatiently. "Pray begin at the beginning, my dear madam; we're all impatient to hear."

"Well, then," commenced the housekeeper, settling herself comfortably in her arm-chair, "you shall hear about it. Just draw your chairs closer round me, for I'm not very long of breath."

We did as the old lady desired, and she went on thus:

"In the year eighteen hundred and nineteen, I was, as I have told you, housekeeper to my Lord Millamant. The story I am telling you has to do with the winter of that same year.

"My Lord had been away from London during the hunting season. He had a pack of hounds at Cartfoil Hall (the family name was Cartfoil), and had been entertaining all the gentry of the country side, with many of the nobility from London, in the true style of old English hospitality.

"All the grand furniture in the mansion on Hay Hill had been covered up since September, when his lordship and her ladyship went out of the town. The carpets in the grand saloons were rolled up, the chandeliers wrapped in yellow gauze; the pictures the same—dreadful grim old pictures there were, of noblemen in curly wigs, and ladies in hoop petticoats and shockingly low dresses—and the rich silver and parcel gilt plate, of which my Lord Millamant, being so great a nobleman, had a vast quantity, was safe and sound in four oak chests, clamped with iron, at Messrs. Doublon & Moydor's, the bankers in Fleet street.

"It was a good plan to send one's silver to the bankers, for there were plenty of housebreakers about in those days, and no police except the wheezy old constables, and the Bow street red waistcoats.

"It was on the 21st of December, 1819, that I received a post letter, franked by Mr. Tubwell, one of the county members for Darkshire, for my Lord Millamant was always too generous with his franks, and never had any to spare for himself.

"The letter was from his lordship, and, in his usual kind style, though to my very great surprise, told me that he and the countess were coming up to spend Christmas in London. All the time I had been in their service, then four years come that Christmas day, they had kept it at Cartfoil Hall.

"However, there was no mistaking my lord's directions. He always gave them himself, for her ladyship, saving her memory, was one of the laziest creatures living, and never did anything much beyond lying on a sofa, and talking to her gray and her green parrot. I was to have the carpets laid down, the furniture thoroughly dusted, all the beds well aired; for my lord was to bring company with him from Darkshire; and I was to get the plate from the banker's, and have it all well cleaned for a grand banquet my lord intended to give on Christmas day.

"Enclosed in the letter was a slip of paper, containing an order to the bankers to deliver the plate to me, or to Mr. Beeswing, the butler; and which, as I can recollect, ran thus:

CARTFOIL HALL, December 19, 1819.

Messrs. Doublon & Moydor:—Please deliver the four boxes marked A, B, C, D, containing the plate left in your care, to Mrs. ——, or Samuel Beeswing, my servants, bearers of this.

(Signed) MILLAMANT.

"There was his lordship's signature, certainly; but somehow the name seemed written in a larger and more tremulous hand than usual; but still the remainder of the letter was like enough to him, and the cover bore the Cartfoil postmark.

"I showed it to Mr. Beeswing, who laughed, and said it was very likely that there had been merry doings at Cartfoil Hall during the week, that my lord had taken t'other bottle overnight, and that his hand was rather shaky the next morning.

"'And you may be sure,' added Beeswing, 'that his lordship punished the small beer, if he did have t'other bottle.'

"The quality drank small beer then, the morning after. Soda-water was invented, but was thought bad for the stomach, and wasn't at all the fashion.

"However, I wasn't quite satisfied. 'I daresay it's very nervous and silly of me, Beeswing,' I said, 'but it behooves us all to be careful. I will take this letter to Wild Mr. Will. He knows my lord's hand well enough, and I shall see what he says to it.'

"Now, Wild Mr. Will, as we servants, many of whom had known him since he was a baby in long clothes, called him, was to the world in general no other than the Honorable William Cartfoil, my lord's younger brother.

"He was a dreadfully wild young man, Mr. Will. He was fond of wine and women, and dice, and all sorts of wickedness. He had been a captain in the Horse Guards, but had sold out. He had fought half a score of duels, and killed two or three people—rest their souls, and be merciful to his—but he was one of the merriest, best-tempered fellows you ever knew or saw.

"My lord was very fond of him, and had paid his debts and set him up again, times out of number; but you could do nothing with Wild Mr. Will. He was always getting into scrapes; and when his lordship had got him out again, getting into new ones. People said he lived mostly now by playing at cards and dice, and that his carryings-on with the actresses at the play-house—the wicked, painted hussies!—were dreadful. I knew he had borrowed money of Beeswing more than once, and had, at least, two-thirds of his sister-in-law's pin-money every quarter; but still no one could help liking him, and he was almost adored by the servants.

"I took the letter to Wild Mr. Will at his lodgings in Great Ryder street, St. James'. He was drinking hock with a captain of dragoons and a low wretch of a fellow that got his living by prize fighting, but he came out on the landing to speak to me. I showed him the letter, and hinted at my doubts.

"'Stuff and nonsense,' he cried, when he had read the letter twice through and held it to the light. 'It's Jack Cartfoil's fist for five hundred guineas.' (My lord's name was John.) 'Newmarket to the knocker of Newgate that it's my brother's hand. Nobody makes blots like these except the Earl of Millamant. Besides, don't you see that he spells "swept" "swep," without the "t." Jack never could spell. Trot you away to the banker's, my worthy soul, and get the plate, and polish it all up nice and bright, for you know how particular my Lord Millamant is, and what a pother there will be if the coronet doesn't come well out on the spoons and forks. There, get along with you, and there's a guinea to drink my health. Stop—mind, for safety you lock the plate up in my lady's boudoir.'

"Of course, after the Hon. William Cartfoil had given his opinion, hesitation was no longer to be thought of. Beeswing and I took a hackney coach to Fleet street, and the head cashier, when he ordered one of the porters to carry the four plate-chests to the carriage, said: "My lord's handwriting was as plain as a pikestaff, and he should like to cash a check for ten thousand with such a Millamant signed to it.'

"He gave me—such a nice gentleman as he was, too—a guinea to drink the health of the firm. Ah, how liberal people were forty years ago!

"We looked over the plate that evening, counted everything; found all in accordance with the lists, and, with the assistance of the three housemaids, I had everything cleaned and polished up by supper-time.

"The plate was all locked up again, and deposited, according to Mr. Will's instructions, in my lady's boudoir, which was at the end of a grand suite of apartments on the first floor. There was no door to this room, only heavy hangings to the doorway; but every window in the house was bolted and barred up.

"Still I felt uneasy with us all alone in the house, and, toward ten o'clock, I slipped up, and going to our butcher, Mr. Chubbychop, in Mount street, Grosvenor square, I borrowed his well-known and fierce bull-dog, "Towler," from him, to keep guard in the house all night. One of the butcher's boys brought the dog, muzzled, to our house, for he was dreadfully savage, and, just before we went to bed, Beeswing unmuzzled him and let him loose in the hall.

"I had dreadful dreams that night. I dreamed of a procession of men carrying coffins, one after the other, in a long procession that never ended. The morning came at last; the youngest housemaid awoke me, and I came down to breakfast in the still-room, when in came Mr. Beeswing, trembling all over, and with a face as white as chalk.

"'For the Lord Almighty's sake come this way?' he cried.

"He led, or rather dragged me to the boudoir on the first floor, and there I saw a sight I shall never to my dying day forget.

"The rich carpet was dabbled in blood, and on it there lay his length along, the body of a man, stark, stiff, and dead. His throat had been literally torn out by the dog, which crouched by his side, uttering a low growl now and then, and licking his lips.

"In one of the dead man's hands was a bunch of skeleton keys. One of the plate chests had been opened, and a portion of the contents were on the floor.

"The men-servants bent over the body to raise it when there was a cry of horror and astonishment.

"God forgive him, and us all! we recognized the body of the Honorable William Cartfoil!

* * * * * * *

"It was discovered afterward that the letter from the country was a forgery, executed, probably, by the unfortunate and guilty man, who had died in this miserable manner. It was found that he had made his entry by a back door leading into the mews, of which he must have had a key, and creeping up a back staircase, had entered the boudoir by a side door he knew well, had been heard by the dog, and so perished.

"The story was hushed up, and it was reported and believed that young Mr. Will had gone abroad and died there."

COULDN'T SEE IT.—A young man from the country, who visited Cleveland, Ohio, the other day, in search of employment, was asked by a man to whom he applied if he could ride horseback, and eagerly replied in the affirmative. His prospective patron told him he had an opening for a young man—a business that necessitated a great deal of traveling. The applicant declared that he should like nothing better than to travel far a living, and a bargain was soon struck between the two. But he was somewhat chagrinned at finding that the business consisted in riding a blind and infirm old horse, in a circular track, for the laudable purpose of grinding tan bark. He declined the proposition.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becomiug a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surpriso, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are persoually acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is grutifying to aunonnce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not hy defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, heurs, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or rejeet at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confideuce which loug experieuce has given, and no douht the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it cau do no harm, as for consultatiou he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice nuless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

THE TRUTH.—There is nothing better, nothing safer, nothing so sure of bringing forth the right fruit in the end, than truth. Tell your child the truth. Tell him that obedience requires unpaid sacrifices. Tell him that he need not expect that a purse of gold will drop in to his hand the moment he denies himself of a coveted treasure. Tell him that the path of duty is often terribly hard, and seldom leads to an oil well, or a seat in Congress, or to a brown stone front house. Tell him that virtue sometimes brings thorns, enmities, neglect. But tell him that it is virtue, nevertheless; the brightest, the noblest, and the best gifts, and whatever comes of goodness it is the one thing desirable, itself above all price. Make him feel that obedience is pleasure, that goodness is delight, that love is altogether lovely, and he will not expect to be paid for the smallest service and be tempted to withhold a kindness when he is not sure of a reward. Parents must cease appealing to the appetites and the avarice of their children if they would have them anything but selfish and sensual.

A FAST STORY.

AN ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman: "they have to commence ringing about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound; the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-grown head of hair and teeth in their mouths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', also, Mechanical Toys, that run by themselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"Indeed! is that so? Who is the firm that have the Dolls saying 'Mamma'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasing? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

OUR CLERK,S BABY.

We have had a clerk who got married. Now, there is nothing funny in that. His wife had a baby—and there's where the funny part comes in. He was in the office yesterday, and wished us to publish, for the benefit of mourners and inquiring friends, the following biog. of the chap. Says he: We have had so many kind friends asking about that baby, that we have thought it necessary to biograph the chap briefly, and somewhat after the current style of the day.

It's a boy.

He's a "buster."

Weighs nine pounds and a quarter, and wife tells us it will grow heavier as his weight increases.

He's the first baby of which we have ever been proprietor, and of course is the only baby in town.

The old woman before mentioned, declared him "the very image of his pa."

"A little copy of his faithful sire,
In face und gesture."

But in justice to the youth we must say we think him an improvement on the original—a world of progress, you know.

This Young American is as old as could be expected, considering the time he was born, and will doubtless be too old for his father in a few years, if he has good luck.

He is quite reticent on politcs, and only wants to be let alone.

We think he favors Mrs. Winslow's policy.

We havn't named it yet. We want to give him a distinguished cognomen, but the fame of our great men is at present so precarious that we don't like the risk.

It is perhaps unnecessary to say, as all biographers do of distinguished personages, that "the subject of this sketch" was born at a very early age. of poor but respectable parents.

A SUITABLE HOLIDAY GIFT.

The best gifts are those that have a permanent value that do not deteriorate with use, or loose their interest and importance with the lapse of time. Diamonds and India shawls are valued on this account: but unfortunately they cost enormous sums of money, and are only adapted to persons occupying a certain social position. There are very few purchasable articles which retain their value, and all the time yield a splended interest in the investment; but among them we must put down first, a GROVER & BAKER SEWING MACHINE. This modern miracle, this magic seamstress with the exact eye and tireless fingers, not only repays over and over again, in a very short time, the money spent in its purchase, but is capable of becoming a small fortune, a lamb of Aladdin, to its possessor. It is the most valuable gift that a husband can make to his wife, a father to his daughter, a friend to the young lady who is about to become a bride, the benevolent to the poor soldier's widow, or a congregation to their minister's wife. It is not only a household assistant, worth the labor of three or four pairs of ordinary hands, but it is a life annuity, a perpetual security against absolute wafit. A clever operator on a GROVER & BAKER Machine can always find remunerative employment—all the more because it accomplishes so wide a range of work. And first-class Sewing Machine is good for a gift, and possesses a certain value; but we recommend the GROVER & BAKER, because it is the best; because it accomplishes the most and best work with the least trouble; because the peculiar stitch is the most durable, as well as the most beautiful; because it is the only one adopted to all kinds of work, and every variety of material; because it is more simple, more easily understood, than others, and requires no delay in rewinding, fasteuing, and the like. There are many other reasons which we could give, but these will suffice with the crowning one; that it never fails to give the most entire and perfect satisfaction. Santa Claus bearing such a gift would be worth indeed a hearty welcome.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND

IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

AN INSANE BRIDE.

ON last Thursday, the 15th ult., says the Ottoway Courier, Dr. La Force, of Agency City, was married to Miss Dudley, the accomplished and beautiful daughter of Edward Dudley, Esq., of the same place. They were married in Mount Pleasant in the morning, and immediately started on the bridal tour, reaching Burlington for dinner. After eating very sparingly, the doctor prepared to start for a boat to convey them to St. Louis, when the young bride refused to go and commenced signs of delirium, which finally gave way to total insanity. It was with much difficulty that she was removed from the hotel, and only through the strategy of a lady resident of Mount Pleasant, who coaxed, pleaded and finally prevailed upon her to go. And all the time she seemed to utterly despise the man upon whom she had bestowed her affections. We first saw them at the B. and M. depot, in Burlington, in the evening, where the weeping husband was endeavoring to get her into a car. She was not wild or frantic, but demure, and positively very obstinate; her eyes dull and vacant, and again the husband was repulsed; the lady before mentioned being the only one who could control her.

It was a sad spectacle—the first moments of the honeymoon spent by the bride in utter obscurity of mind, and the husband in bitter grief, while a great crowd gathered around to surmise, blink, leer, speculate, wonder and sympathize. Having taken a seat in the car, her chilling moans and incoherent words wrung tears from the heart of more than the doting bridegroom, whom she would not allow to sit beside her. After running to within a few miles of Mount Pleasant a lucid moment came upon her, and she asked for her lover, who sprang with the eagerness of loving impatience to her side, but to be doomed to disappointment, for it was only temporary sanity. Upon reaching the station, however, she took his arm and walked out demurely, though still piteously moaning, and we rattled on, sadly thinking of the insane honeymoon. It is an unaccountably strange case, as nothing of the kind was ever before known in her family, and there was no opposition in any manner to the nuptials, and she is unusually intelligent, of a healthy and happy disposition, and was affectionately attached to her husband.

THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.—The Journal of Commerce thinks that the English language will become universal. "It is now," it says, "spoken over a vastly larger portion of the earth's surface than any other. It has become, to a great extent, the commercial language of the world; is heard in every port of the various great oceans; is giving words, expressions and terms to other and older languages which resist its supremacy; and seems destined to become, either in its present form or in some future variation, the common language of all races of men. There is nothing extravagant in the idea. It is one of the indications of history, and it leads to very strong conclusions in reference to the future tendency of emigration, when the lands now held by them shall cease to satisfy the Anglo Saxons."

THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.—The gradual wearing away of the Falls of Niagara from year to year has become a subject of constant remark. This wearing away, however, is so slow as to be scarcely perceptible; but it is said that the American Falls have undergone a great change—huge masses of rock having caved in and fallen, giving that part of the Falls quite as perfect a horse-shoe shape as those on the Canadian side of the river.

FIND FAULT IN PRIVATE.—Find fault, when you must find fault, in private, and if possible, some time after the offence, rather than at the time. The blamed are less inclined to resist when they are blamed without witnesses. Both parties are calmer, and the accused person may be struck with the forbearance of the accuser who has seen the fault, and watched for a private and proper time for mentioning it.

AYER'S

CHERRY PECTORAL,

FOR THE RAPID CURE OF

COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA, HOARSENESS, CROUP, BRONCHITIS, INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION, AND FOR THE RELIEF OF CONSUMPTIVE PATIENTS IN ADVANCED STAGES OF THE DISEASE.

SO wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous are the cases of its cures, that almost every section of country abounds in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other Expectorant is too apparent to escape observation and where its virtues are [illegible], the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs that are incident to our climate. While many inferior remedies thrust upon the community have failed and been discarded, this having gained friends by every trial, conferred benefits on the afflicted they can never forget, and produced cures too numerous and too remarkable to be forgotten.

We can only assure the public, that its quality is carefully kept up to the best it ever has been, and that it may be relied on to do for their relief all that it has ever done.

Great numbers of clergymen, Physicians, Statesmen, and eminent personages, have lent their names to certify the unparalleled usefulness of our remedies, but space here will not permit the insertion of them. The Agents below named furnish gratis our AMERICAN ALMANAC in which they are given; with also full descriptions of the complaints they cure.

Those who require an alterative medicine to purify the blood will find AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA the remedy to use. Try it once, and you will know its value.

The Modern Ghost.

Inasmuch as ghosts are supposed to add respectability to the neighborhood which they frequent, though they, at the same time cause the rates of house rent to decrease, poetical landlords in this country have been inclined to afford every encouragement to ghosts, and the man who owns fifteeen houses is by no means averse to giving up one of the fifteen as, "a haunted house," to the occupancy of ghosts. In "old England" ghosts have been treated shamefully of late; just as soon as a ghost comfortably establishes itself in a house and commences to smash the crockery ware, a detective policeman is called in and generally succeeds in "laying the ghost" by arresting the servant girl for malicious mischief in attaching horse hair to plates and dishes, and by this means making them seemingly in a suicidal manner cast themselves off their shelves and smash themselves. Englishmen will tolerate ghosts of "bleeding nuns" who haunt ancient ruins whose site is not required for a railway station, but as soon as a ghost appears in a modern dwelling house the landlord incontinently proceeds to buy it, by calling in a policeman. Under these circumstances what wonder is it that the ghosts are emigrating to the United States? Like all immigrants they are welcomed; they are not required to "declare their intentions." they are looked upon as distinguished foreigners, and treated with the courtesy due to visitors. America being a new country, is intensely flattered when it discovers a ghost. For some time it was considered that ghosts were a special luxery of the Old Country, but nous avons changé tout cela and we now raise our own ghosts. American ghosts are eminently muscular; you don't find the American ghost standing at your bedside dressed in a clear white night gown and pointing to a wound in its breast. The American ghost has no sickly sentimentality about it; it is an American ghost and adapts itself to the country. In England we hear of ghosts who go about at night clanking chains; this is because there was a time in England when people who had not committed any disreputable act were forced to wear chains; these are hoary old ghosts who became ghosts ever so many years ago. Chicago has had, if we are to believe the statement of the Republican, a remarkable ghost. This ghost has been haunting Mr. Skeels and family who lived in a house on Randolph street. As the ghost threw crockery ware about in the most indiscriminate manner Mr. Skeels, though a man of amiable disposition—one who would willingly harbor any quiet, well-disposed ghost—called in the police officer Slaven who is, we are assured by the Republican "a firm disbeliever in all things supernatural;" yet his experience is given us follows:

"Nothing unusual occured until three o'clock, at which hour he heard three distinct raps on the partition between the main room and the bed-room. Springing to his feet he threw open the doors, and saw several chairs, on which were a pile of bed-clothing, and which were standing near the head of the bed, dancing in a very unaccountable manner. He approached them and their motion ceased. Turning back and walking again into the front room, he heard a noise as if some heavy object was sliding upon the floor. In an instant he turned, and saw the bed, on which were lying the two women, slide away from the wall and then move back, striking the wall. Then one of the women called out that there was some one under the bed, trying to raise it up. Taking the lantern, the officer looked under it, but no one was there. Completely puzzled, he went back into the main room and sat down. In less than fifteen minutes he heard something rattle on the bed-room floor. One of the women exclaimed: 'There it is again!' Going into the bed-room again he picked from the floor an iron spider, which Mrs. Skeels positively stated had not been outside of the closet for two days. To have reached the position in which he found it, according to her statement, it must have passed through two walls! It was removed, and nothing further attracted his attention until he was relived.

When a policeman sees "several chairs on which were a pile of bed-clothing, and which were standing near the head of the bed dancing in an unaccountable manner" he must be excused if he becomes puzzled. The Chicago ghost is a sportive being. As the Republican—the paper which owns the ghost—considers the following worthy of being recorded, we must believe that the ghost was responsible for it:

"Another circumstance occured which is worthy of mention, at about nine o'clock The room was at this time crowded with people, when a noise was heard in the hall. The door was opened, and a cat—not a spiritual, but a genuine feline—with an inflated bladder tied to her tail, rushed into the room. A portion of the spectators drew back in affright from this strange apparition. Tubby was secured, her incumbrance removed, and quiet once more restored."

This mode of illustrating the "Speeritual Feelosophee" is far ahead of Mrs. Cuppy, and we do not believe that Mrs. Foye could raise a spirit capable of tying a bladder to a cat's tail. We are grieved to notice that, ghosts are falling into disrepute. It is all the fault of the newspapers. Who can respect a ghost who is reported to have tied a bladder to a cats tail? We object to modern ghosts. Let our ghosts, like our dragons live in history alone. The modern ghost is a nuisance even if he does not steal the silver spoons.

Corncopia.

I was startled this morning—us Christmas come in—
From a deep dream of peace by a horrible din.
As my dull powers roused to a sense of the sound,
I sat up in affright, and looked eagerly round.
I was scarce half awake, but, it seemed that the air
Was rent and disturbed by a wild trumpet blare
Which echoed to Heaven, and e'en down to—well,
Any depth, to be reached by such horrible knell.
I thought all the fiends had escaped, and were sounding
Sweet strains of old Satan's own special compounding.
Each note gave a wound like a rusty old blade;
The din was unceasing—I groaned as though flayed.
I am not at all nervous, in fact I'm quite cool,
But the man had been brainless, nay, worse than a fool,
Who had lain still enduring that torture in doubt,
So I e'en "faced the music," resolved to find out,
Despite all the dangers, determined to know
What presaged these portents, this terrible blow!
I rushed to the window, and through, ('twas just dawn,)
Saw an army of boys, each blowing a horn—
Crest-fallen and fruntie I crept back to bed,
Calling down maledictions on his or her head
Who imported, invented, sold or gave away
Those infernal tin trumpets about Christmas day. H. S. B.

The Concert of the Season.

The public are frequently promised "the concert of the season." In our opinion the concert of the season was given at Charley S—'s, on Christmas Eve, and it was all the more pleasant for the reason that it was a concert that the many-headed monster—the public—could not procure for money. It has been many years since so much musical talent and so many fine voices have been brought together in San Francisco.

The occasions on which "The Twelve" appear in public have become so few, that the question is often asked, "do they still exist as a club?" The truth is, that they do not as a body, seek public engagements; but that they are now as perfect exponents of part singing—adepts in rendering those delicious gems of harmony, written for male voices, as can be found in the United States, was apparent to the select few who were invited to attend the little reunion on Christmas Eve. Wine, wit and song flowed freely; that the members of "The Twelve" paid undue attention to the first named article, for the temperate habits of the club are proverbial and beautifully expressed in the grand old glee, which they so seldom sing in public:

To scythians leave those wild excesses,
Ours be the joy which soothes and blesses,
And while the temp'rate bowl we wreathe,
Our choral hymns we'll sweetly breathe,
Beguiling every hour along,
In harmony of soul and song.

After supper, Geo. T. Evans sat down to the piano and regaled the company with delicious touches of instrumentation Although the specialty of "The Twelve" is the correct rendering of harmonized songs and glees, there is no lack of soloists among them. The names of Herberte—who has recently become a member—Wunderlich, Stadfeldt, not to mention others, are an illustration of the fact.

One of the sweetest serenades we ever listened to was sung by a Quartette of the club, Its name is "Open thy lattice fair maid;" the words by Swift, one of the first tenors of the club, and the music by Geo. T. Evans. The guests of the evening, although few in number, represented many nationalities, and among the pieces sung, were "God save the Queen," the Russian Nutioual Anthem, "Let Erin Remember"—as only Waunderlich can sing it. "The Marsellaise Hymn" and other national airs; these pieces, however, were only sandwiched in between those gems of compositions from the "Arion" which form such an important part in the repertoire of the club. We must mention that Herberte, on this occasion, sang the beautiful descriptive song entitled "Will o' the Wisp," which was composed for W. H. Weiss, by J. W. Cherry, the author of "Shells of the Ocean." We hope that he will before long favor the public with this splendid song.

Speak for Yourself.

Says the Sacramento Union:—

"It never rains but it pours." If California were older, she might put in a claim to be the birth-place of the proverb. When dry, she is parched; when wet, within a head of drowning."

All very true, so far as Sacramento is concerned, but why broaden the application to all California? We in San Francisco here, have never been "within a head of drowning." We have a small earthquake now and then, just to shake us up a little, and keep us lively, but we have never been obliged to do our marketing in boats, or to make our New Year's calls by stepping into three-story windows.

A Vivid Pen Portrait of Captain Callaghan.

The Alta, on Thursday last, devoted a considerable portion of its space to a description of the personal appearance of Captain Charles Callaghan, of the Reynard. The Alta considered this "pertinent," as it stated, because Captain Callaghan had charged certain members of the crew with mutinous conduct. It is to be regretted that the Alta did not publish an original likeness of Captain Callaghan—a picture of a captain would have served to enliven its columns more than the little vignettes of ships, dogs' heads, pianos, houses, etc., with which it ornaments its advertising department. However, the pen of the ready writer of the editorial corps of the Alta has done its work so fully, that we are comforted for the lack of an engraving. We are told that:—

"Captain Charles Callaghan is in his 51st year. He has followed the sea since boyhood, and by well-proved worth, step by step, worked his way from the humblest position in the forecastle to the highest on the quarter-deck. He is a thorough sailor, we need hardly say, or, as the popular phrase goes, 'what he doesn't know about a ship, isn't worth knowing."

After this, we learn the following interesting particulars respecting Captain Charles Callaghan and Mrs. Callaghan:

"Among his personal friends are the chief merchants and bankers. In personal appearance and manners he has nothing of that brusqueness of speech or negligence of dress, which are generally supposed to be characteristic of "old salts." On the contrary, he has the affability of the drawing-room and the dress of a refined landsman. Perhaps this is owing in some degree to the fact that his accomplished wife, a native of the Hub of Creation, always accompanies him in his ship. He is about five feet ten inches in hight, and has a perceptible stoop, caused by injury from a fall at sea many years since."

It is useless for the Times to attempt to rival the enterprise of the Alta. Had it not been for the Alta the public generally would probably have remained in ignorance of the fact that Captain Callaghan was "about five feet ten inches in height" and had "a perceptible stoop." It is interesting to the public to know that the Captain's wife was on board—this fact of itself alone, should have precluded any mutinous ideas entering the heads of any of the crew. As far as our experience goes, "the Captain's wife" is a supernumerary officer on a ship, who generally exercises more authority, in an indirect way, than the Captain himself The writer in the Alta, in order to make his article impressive, splashes in some terrible bad Latin. He says that the Captain, "et necessitatee rei," did something. The Alta proprietors have money, they should be able to afford to engage one decently educated reader, to revise the copy furnished by their editors, and thus guard against publishing a Latin sentence, of three words, with two errors in it.

Mrs. Woxcackle, on the Church Situation.

MR. EDDYTER:—O my poor distractid hed! The strait of worriment and bewilderment in which I am, is such as cannot be discribed by mortual pen—leastways not by mine. What things is coming to, if they go on as now they are, is awful to contemplate upon. The Bishop has isshood his "prouunsbyomeantto" as Mr. Woxcackle calls it, wich I presoom he means his lait butiful pastorial letter agaynst worldly amusements and rekreashuns on religious festyvals on Crismas Eve, which noue can gainsay the right of, and yet, the gentlemen that maniged the festyvals went on regardless and disrespectful, jest as if there was no ekklesyastical orthority in the Dyoceese, and as if ours was a church without a Bishop or a Caythedral, and had their performance, dancing and cauvass floor and all, according to advertysement, all of which is harrowing to the feelings of them that love pease and bomminy, and conkord in relijus cirkles. And now the talk is that St James' will be cut off and excommunicatid, and that Mr. B—r and Mr. A—n are going to set up a church or their own, with Mr, Eagan as the hed of it, wbich with the Cathylic Church and the Episkipil, and the Prispyteerin, and the Methidist, and the Mormons and all the other sekts and herrisys, I for one cannot see the need of. But Mr. Eagan's friends air determined to stand by him, and says he shall preach, Bishop or no Bishop, and paid no attention to his letter, and air in short, as headstrong as ever. What to do I know not. Mr. Eagan has been to me more tender than a bruther, and is, if ever such there was in mortual form, a blessed saint on earth; but if the Bishop turns his church into a conventikle no better than a disseutiug meeting house, and he becomes a sizmatic and a heretick, I might as well be a downwrite Prispyteerin, as to side with him, wich never can I bring myself to do; but that standing connatly will yet find a way to heel the breech and prevent skandal and contenshun, I still hope and pray. Your's Respectful,

MARIA WOXCACKLE.

An Oracle.

The Alta seems to be rushing into the literary field with all the "effusion" of a novice. Its "book notices" have long been singularly wooden and unappreciative; now they are all at once becoming wildly sensational. They are so intensely patriotic—so enthusiastic in their appreciation of what "we," the Anglo Saxons of this generation have achieved in literature, that no American Anglo Saxon can peruse them without experiencing a thrill of exultation. The new critic of the Alta (for beyond all peradventure he is a new critic) unhesitatingly assures his readers that the present, is the greatest poetical epoch that the world has ever seen, and, furthermore, that the poetry of the English language is more valuable than all the poetry of all the other languages together. In these amazing judgments, we have no doubt that the auctioneers (being a thoroughly loyal and patriotic body) will heartily concur.

AN OCEAN WAIF.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

JOHN CROSS, sir, late able seaman of the clipper-ship Southern Star, trading to Sydney, and carrying passengers, only a rough sailor, and has been through many a storm at sea, but weathered them all, to sit here, sir, and let you take all the yarn down just as it all happened, word for word, and if you like, I'll kiss the book afore starting.

We had a good run out, and had got all our cargo ashore, and lay alongside o' the wharves in Sydney harbor, high out of water. Some o' the chaps was ashore, when my mate, Tom Black—not the mate o' the ship, you know, but my mate as was good friends with me—and me was leaning over the bulwarks, when we see a gentleman on the wharf, down below, with a couple o' young ladies as looked like his daughters, and he seemed peeping about as if he wanted to come aboard.

"Captain on board, my man?" he says.

"No, sir," I says, touching my hat, "Mate is, sir."

An then he led one o' the young ladies up the hatches as was laid across to the wharf; an the other was afraid to follow, so I swings myself off, and on to the wharf, and then holds out my hand to steady her and lead her aboard; and she smiled at me as if she knew it would be all right, and laid her pretty little yellow kid-glove in my great tarry fist, and I had her safe aboard in no time, when she looked up at me, and said "Thank you sailor," in such a sweet way, that it was almost music; and just then, I saw that I'd left the marks of my fist on her delicate little gloved hand, and I felt that savage and vexed as I stood there rubbing my hand down my trousers, I hardly knew what to do. I felt as silly as a great gal, and she saw it, and looked at her glove, and made a pretty little face at it, and then laughed and nodded at me; and if I didn't feel—being an ignorant sort of fellow—just as if I should have liked to have been her dog.

"Mr. Smith ain't aboard," say Tom to me in a whisper—shovin' his elber right into my ribs, as if daylight through would do me good—"he's gone ashore."

"Where shall we find the mate?" says the gentleman just then; and a fine fierce old chap he looked, almost as brown as Tom, with sharp eyes, hook nose, and a great white beard, half covering his face; while as to the two young ladies as seemed to be his daughters, they looked to me more like angels than anything else. So, "Where shall we find the mate?" says the gentleman; and in my blundering way, I was obliged to tell him as I'd made a mistake.

"Ah! never mind, my man," he says; "I have taken a passage home to the old country in your ship, and my daughters, they thought they would like to look around. You and that other man are a couple of the sailors, eh?" he says in a sharp, sharp way.

"Yes sir," I says, touching my hat again, for he spoke just like a captain.

"Glad of it," he says; "there's a honest look about you. There, you can drink the young ladies' health when you go ashore!" and he gave me a shilling. "Now, I suppose you'll take us home safe?"

"That we will," I says, "sir; for a better ship never sailed;" and what with talking in such company, and what with being called honest-looking, I felt quite red in the face.

"Bravo!" says the gentleman, clapping me on the shoulder; "I like a man to be proud of his ship."

Then I saw both the young ladies smile, and I thought it was at me, and that made me fell more blundering than ever; so that when I took them and showed them all over the ship, and the cabin, and all the different parts, and told them what a quick run we had made, I'm afraid I did it very clumsily; but they all thanked me; and when the gentleman took one young lady by the hand, and led her ashore—the one he brought aboard, with long, dark hair—the other one, as had bright, golden-yellow curls flowing like all down her back, she gave me her hand again, just as if it was quite natural, and tripped over the hatchway to the wharf, while I held it all the while tightly clinging to mine. and then again she said, "Thank you sailor!" and I stood looking after them, for they were gone; and somehow as I stood there, it seemed as if something had come over the day, and it looked dull; while I could feel the pressure of that little hand on mine, and there was another shilling there—that shilling as is sewed up in a little leather purse, and hangs round my neck, and as I hope it 'll hang when I'm sewn up in my hammock, and the twenty-four pound shot takes me to the bottom.

"Cheerly men, ho, yo-ho!" and up came another; and then down it went into the deep hold, where some of our chaps rolled 'em along into their places, cask after cask of tallow; and warm work it was on that hot January day. But we were at work with a will, and soon made the good ship sink a bit in the water.

We got our tallow on board, packed and jammed and stammed, so that I don't care how the ship lurched—there would n't be no shifting down in the hold; for our first-mate, Mr. Smith—Hammer and tongs, we used to call him—was a first-class sailor, and would have everything done well, and keep us at it, over and over again, till it was done. Of course the chaps didn't like him none the better for it; but he was a good mate, for all that.

One day the captain came aboard, and began talking to Mr. Smith about getting a place ready for I don't know how many thousand ounces of gold as we were to take back.

"Hear that, Tom?" I says.

"What?" says he.

"Why, we're a-going to shy the tallow overboard, and fill up with gold."

"Gammon!" he says; but the next morning, down comes the gold with a convoy o' police round the trucks; and then we had to carry aboard a lot of little wood-chests marked, and painted, and bound with iron. Gallus heavy they were, too, and I don't know how much they were worth apiece; but when they was packed down in the little cabin cleared out for 'em, they didn't seem to take up much room; and one didn't feel a bit dazzled or struck.

"Why, it don't seem much to make a fuss about," I says to Tom.

"You're right, old boy," he says; "and yet those two chaps is going to stay aboard to guard it till we sails."

"Well, I s'pose it's all right," I says; "but there ain't much to show, if it is a rich cargo. I'd sooner go in for the tallow."

We was pretty busy now getting in our fresh meat and vegetables, and taking in our water, and one thing and another; when one day a bounceable chap, with a big black beard, one of a party of six, came on board to secure berths. They'd been partners up at the diggings, and were going to bring their gold abroad; and a precious fuss they made with the captain and mate about being safe, and proper protection, and so on. This chap, Hicks he called hisself, was peeping about aboard and asking the mate about our chaps, whether he thought this man honest, and that t'other one fit to trust, and all on in that way, till I could see with half an eye as old Hammer and Tongs felt savage enough to kick him overboard.

Next night they was all six aboard, with the captain; and they had a table and chairs out on the poop, and sat smoking and drinking the captain's pale ale. They talked very big about what they'd made, and what an encumbrance it was, and how glad they should be to have it safe aboard.

I happened to be sitting mending and splicing a bit by a lantern, so I heard a good deal of the conversation.

"You see it's safe, I think, now, for they have it in the strong room at the hotel; but if you'll take it into your charge to-morrow, captain, we should be glad to have it off our minds."

This was the one called Hicks as spoke, and then another chimes in, and he says, "But the captain must be answerable."

"O yes; of course," says Hicks. "But curse it, Phillips, if you ain' the worst of us all. You'll have the yellow fever, if you don't soon get rid of your share."

"I wonder you didn't turn it into notes," says the captain. "There they are, snug in your pocket book, and nobody a bit the wiser."

"What's the good of shying a hundred pounds away?" says another of 'em. "Why, we can make that, and more too, in the old country."

"What's in it?" says the captain.

"Three cases—government pattern," says Hicks; "all regular and in style; and without being too funky, captain, I'm blest if it ain't like a nightmare allus on us. We've had more than one fight for it, and one chap had four inches of that in his ribs for trying to meddle with what warn't his own;" and then he pulled out a nasty awkward-looking knife, as I could see the gleam of as he gave it a bit of a flourish.

"I made a noise with that, too," says another, pulling out a revolver; and then it came out as they were all armed.

"And I tell you what it is, captain," says Hicks; "we'd one and all shed every drop of blood in our veins before we'd be chowsed out of it now, after the years of toil and danger we've had."

"All right, gentlemen, all right," says the captain. "I don't wonder at what you say; but my crew to a man are English—none of your beggarly coolies or Lascars; so I think you'll be pretty safe. Winds and waters permitting, I'll see you safe into Liverpool Docks; and if I don't, it won't be my fault."

Then they sat drinking another bottle or two of ale, and went ashore.

That night as I lay close aside of Tom Black, it was that hot that we could neither of us sleep, for not a breath of air came between our hammocks. I got talking about the gold, and about these swell chaps as was coming aboard, and I says: "Tell you what, old boy, if I'd got a chest o' gold, I don't think I should go crying out, 'Look ye here!' even if I had a six-shooter to take care of it with. I'd mark it as lead or copper, or something of that sort."

"Gammon," says Tom. "Who goes traveling with a chest of lead or copper? That wouldn't be no good."

"Well, then, I'd shove it in a coffin, and pretend it was a corpus," I says.

"Yes," says Tom; "and ten to one, if it was rough weather, some o' the chaps would say Jonah was aboard, and shove the coffin out of one o' the lee ports on a dark night. How then, old hoss?"

Well, I hadn't got nothing to say to that; and as I hadn't got any gold of my own to bother about, I turns over, and goes to sleep, and dreams about seeing angels in a sunshiny land, and they'd all got long golden hair, and black velvet hats with white feathers, and wore yellow kid gloves.

CHAPTER II.

They say it does rain over there sometimes; and when it does come down, it's a wash away; but there never came any rain in my time; and of all the hot, dusty, dry places I ever did see, that there Sydney's about the worst. We were pretty well ready for sea now, and a sight more snug than when we were coming out; for cargo and traps had come in comfortable-like, some at a time, and not bull-roosh all together. That very next day comes our six passengers, with a deal of fuss, and a truck, and a couple of policemen to bring the three little chests on board; for all their luggage, which wasn't much, came on day before. It did seem such a hullabaloo to make about three little boxes, that, as we took 'em aboard, some of us couldn't help having a little bit of chaff about it among ourselves; and precious savage those six passengers looked about it, I can tell you. You see, they weren't gentlemen; but the sorter chaps as I set down in my mind to go on the spree when they got home, and spend all they'd got in a couple o' months; and so I told Tom Black.

Well, once the treasure was all aboard, we did not see much of our six gentlemen till the day of sailing. We had Major Horton's luggage on board—for that was the name of the gentleman as had the two daughters; and just at the last, when we were getting up the anchor, after lying away from the wharf a couple of days, Major Horton came off with the ladies in the same boat with our captain; and when he saw who were going to be passengers as well, I don't think he much liked it; but he didn't say anything; and as he and his daughters had a cabin to themselves, and a servant-lad too, who, it did not much matter to them. I managed to get to the gangway, and was going to help the same young lady aboard as she was being slung up; but the black-bearded chap, Hicks, starts forward, shoves me on one side, and takes off his hat, and holds out his hand. But I warn't sorry to see her just lightly lay her hand on his arm for a moment, then bow stiffly, and take her father's arm, quite turning her back on my gentleman; and then giving me a smile and a nod, just to thank me all the same—though I didn't help her.

You see when that Hicks shoved me back, it was as if some one had rubbed all one's fur up wrong way, while, when I got that smile and nod, it was like a hand smoothing me down again; but I must say as I should have liked to pitch that chap over the bulwarks.

I'd no time to see more then, for old Hammer and Tongs was letting go at us all like blazes. He did swear that day, and no mistake: for he was one o' them old-style sailors as couldn't get on without. I don't believe he meant any harm; but Lord bless you, how he would go on! It was like a thunderstorm—thunder and lightning—thunder and lightning, till the bit of work was done; and then he'd stand there rubbing the perspiration off his old bald head, and dabbing himself, and smiling, and—"Werry well done, my lads—werry well done indeed," he'd say, and this day he turns round to Major Horton, as was standing close by.

"Smart bit of seamanship," he says, "wasn't it, sir?"

"Well, really, I'm no judge," said Major Horton; "but I thought the men were getting wrong over it, by your being so angry."

"Angry, sir!" says old Smith; "angry! Lord bless you, I wasn't angry; I never see the lads do it better;" and he looked so surprised and innocent that our captain couldn't help laughing.

"It's a way of his, he's got, sir; that's all."

"Ah!" says Major Horton, with his face a bit screwed up; "then I hope he will not have that way of his on often when my daughters are on deck;" and then he walked aft.

Our captain cocked his eye, and grinned at old Smith; and the old chap screwed up that old figure-head of his just like a bit of carved mahogany; and then he blew out his cheeks, and stared at the captain, and he says; "I must turn over a new leaf, mate. But, I say, that was rather hot, wasn't it?"

A fine fair breeze as ever blew homeward, and the good ship bent to it with every stitch set, and away we went through the blue water, sending it out behind us covered with white foam: and now for days past we had seen nothing but blue sky and blue sea.

I hadn't seen much of the ladies, only just when they took a walk on the deck with their father; for, after the first day or two, they never came on deck alone, on account of that Hicks, and the one as they called Phillips—a long, sandy-whiskered chap, but one has had a wonderful good opinion of hisself, and along with this Hicks, tried it on very strong to make himself agreeable to the ladies.

The young ladies did all that well-bred folks know so well how to manage—such as giving these chaps cold answers, and all sorts o' ways showing 'em as their company wasn't wanted; but it wasn't a bit of use, bless you, and they showed themselves so forward at last that the ladies didn't show at all, which made me feel a bit mad, for I felt to know why it was. Then my gentlemen must try it on with the father when he came on deck to smoke his cigar, for they were most always sitting somewhere about smoking and drinking bottled beer. Now they'd ask him to take a glass with them; another time to take a cigar; but as far as I saw, and Tom Black told me, he always as civilly as could be said "No;" and showed them that he belonged to a different class of ship, and wanted to keep hisself to hisself.

But that didn't suit our gentlemen, and this Phillips must be always borrowing a light of the Major, and walking aside him along the deck, turning when he turned; and so thick-skinned he was that he could not, or would not, see how he was being snubbed: and more than once I've seen the gray-headed old gentleman go down into his cabin quite vexed and savage-like.

And yet he wasn,t proud; for when Tom and I have had the watch of a night, he'd come and give us a cigar apiece, and stop for long enough talking; and the same with either of us when it was our spell at the wheel. As for him and old Smith, after that bit of a fly the first day, they were as thick as thiek: and the old ehap never did let out but once before the ladies, and then he brought hisself up short with a spank in the mouth; and Tom said he went and begged pardon afterwards; but I don't quite believe that.

One lovely evening, when there was one of those glorious sunsets as turns everything, sea, sky, ship, and rigging, into gold, Miss Hortou and Miss Madeline, which was her dark-haired sister, were both up on deck, for the unpleasant party was all below iu the captain's cabin, and talking a good deal —so Tom said, for he was close aside the skylight—about where we were, and seeming to know a good deal about latitude and longitude, and so on.

"They ain't half-bred sailors," says Tom to me: "but it strikes me, Jaek, as they're a bad lot, and I don't like the look of 'em. The captain does, though, for they are awfully thiek, and they've got the chart out there, and he's almost tight, but he's showing them exactly where we are."

"What a pair of handsome gals those are, Tom?" I says. looking along the deck, for I was thinking of something else.

"Yes," says Tom; "and if I was their father. I shouldn't take it so coolly, is that hook-nosed chap Hicks, and that other long awry chap, was always follering them about."

"P'raps he don't know it," says I.

"P'raps they don't tell," I says, "so as to save a rumpus; for I don't think their old man would stand much nonsense. I'm blest if I should like to upset him."

"Look at that, now," says Tom.

But I was looking; and just then, the very two ehaps as we'd mentioned eame up on deek, and first thing they does was to put themselves so as to meet the ladies, and smile and bow.

I saw Miss Madeline press closer up to her sister, and as they went by, they slightly bowed, and then walked towards where Tom and I stood, so as to be pretty close; when they went and stood gazing out to sea.

Up eomes my two gentlemen; and I could see them as they'd both had as much as they could carry; and one goes on one side o' the sisters, and the other the far side, and then they leaned round and looked right in their faces, and said something as made both start back and cross over to the other side—for another of the party stood lolling and smoking just by the cabin stairs—ours being a flush deck.

"Steady mate," says Tom, getting tight hold of my wrist, for I was going to do something—I don't quite know what; but I felt all red-hot like.

"'Tain't your business, Jack Cross."

Well I didn't see that; for if it ain't a sailor's duty to succor a maiden in distress, whose duty is it?—tell me that; but I stood quite still, hoping that the father would eome up.

"And if he does pitch him overboard," I says, thinking aloud, "why, 'ware sharks."

"Just what I thought, Jack," says Tom Black.

I could see as the poor girls looked frightened, and Miss Horton—Mary, as she told me her name was—dropped her handkerchief on the deck, but turned to pick it up: but Hicks was too sharp for her, and he got hold of it, kissed it, and began stuffing it in his wesket.

I saw Miss Mary flush up, and I've never seen anyone look so handsome since; and her eyes seemed to flash, as she says, "If you're a gentleman, sir, you will immediately restore that handerchief."

"My angel," he say, "never!—Now," he says, taking hold of her hand, and drawing it through his arm, "don't be so cross; let's have a walk, and talk it over."

She did not speak, but struggled to get away; and then turned her head towards me, as if to ask for help, and our eyes met, though there was a good distance between us.

That was enough. I saw she was too brave to scream, though she was backing towards the cabin-stairs, while her sister tried to follow; but Phillips kept between 'em, and wouldn't let her pass. That was enough for me. I shook Tom off, and made a rush, and stopped short half-way, as Miss Mary made towards me, and I caught her in my arms, just as I saw Hicks go down like a bullock, and roll over, stunned and bleeding on the white deck; while, directly after, Phillips caught a lift under the ear, as sent him staggering against the long-boat, when he tipped up, went in, and you saw his heels for a moment, and then he was gone.

Talk about a lion; why, the old gentleman's beard seemed to bristle, and he couldn't speak, but he gave me a wag of the head to help Miss Mary down; and I tried to carry her for a few steps, but she asked me to set her down direetly, and then she took my arm, and we followed the Major and Miss Madeline into the cabin; and I was coming away, when the old gentleman eame up and shook me by both hands. "I'll talk to you to-morrow," he says. "I thought I knew an honest face when I saw it."

I backed out, awkward enough, and feeling somehow quite ashamed of what I had done; and the last thing as I saw there was Miss Madeline crying in her sister's arms. While, when I got back on deek, both of them gentlemen had made theirselves scaree; and the only thing to show as there had been anything wrong, was some blood as Jack Cross was swabbing up, while old Smith was looking on as black as thunder.

CHAPTER III.

There was a pretty sharp row about that evening's upsets, and I believe the captain apologized to Major Horton about it. I don't thiuk the old soldier thought any less of the captain on account of it, for they kept very good friends; but I never, during the next four days, onee saw the ladies on deek alone; while, as for Hicks and his party—well I have seen a few ill looks pass iu my time, but I never did see anythiug quite to equal some of them as were sent from that party after the gray bearded old major.

We were a crew of eighteeu men—all told—four of 'em being fresh hands, shipped at Sydney: and on the fourth night after the upset, it being our watch, Tom and me leaned over the bulwarks together, talking quite low, for Hicks' party had a table and chairs elose by, and were sittiug smoking and drinking.

"Jaek," says Tom to me all at once, for he was a deep, quiet chap, alway putting this and that together—"Jack," he says, "there's something up."

"All right," I says; "what is it?"

"Them four chaps as shipped at Sydney."

"Well what of them? They are regular swabs anyhow.

"They're a bad lot," says Tom; and then Hiek's party got up, and eame sauntering along towards us.

"I watehes my ehance," says Tom in the same tone; "and the next time as he eome under, down goes the harpoon, and I hit him a slap. He pulled hard enough, but I had him; and arter so much salt horse, a bit of fish is first rate, if it is only bonito."

"Eh?" I says, for I couldn't make out he was running a guy.

"Keep dark," he says; "they're a coming back."

"You know," say Tom, going on again, "all you have to do is to look sharp, and aim straight; any fellow could do it; and if the skipper'll let us, we'll—There," says Tom, "they're gone down now, and our watch is up; so let's turn in."

And I followed him down, and turned into my hammock close aside his, hardly knowing what to make of him.

"Now, I tell you what," says Tom, beginning again, "there's something up, my lad."

"Well," I says.

"How came them six passengers to be so thick with Rudd, und Johnson, and Broek, and Perkins?"

"How should I know?" I says. "Why, what an old mare's-nest hunter you are, mate."

"I've been reckoning 'em up, Jack, for above a week; and I knows a little more than they think for; and now I just want to get one more knot undone. and then I shall lay it all afore the skipper. You're asleep, ain't you?"

"No, I ain't," I says, rousing up, for I had been next door to it.

"Well, I tell you what," he says, "they mean that gold—that's what they mean!"

"What, their own?" I says, getting interested; for though I chaffed him, I thought a good deal of what Tom Black said.

"No, no," he says—"the treasure; and I'm blest if I don't think as them three chests o' theirs is all on 'em dummies. Now, then, what d' yer think o' that, lad?"

I was so took aback for a bit, that I didn't know what to think; so I says, "What makes you think so?"

"What do they want to be such good friends with them four chaps for, when nobody else is there; and not know 'em when somebody's a looking on? What do they want to know so exactly where the ship is, and to get her place marked on the chart for? What do they pretend to know nothing about the sea, for, and always call every sheet and bit of tackle by the right name, and have their sea-legs as soon as they come aboard?"

I didn't say nothing.

"I tell you what it is, Jack Cross," he says, "it's my belief as there'll be a fight afore long, and p'raps a change o' skippers; and if so, why, the Lord ha' mercy on them two poor gals."

"Tom," I says, growing quite husky, "surely not quite so bad as that."

"Mate," he says, "there's fifty thousand pouud worth o' gold in them little boxes, and what some chaps would do for that—"

"What's the matter?" I says, for he'd stopped short.

He didn't answer, but leaned over and elapped his hand across my mouth, and of course I lay still as could be, listening.

After a minute, he takes his hand away, and says: "There's some devilment up, Jack Cross, and I'm hanged, mate, if I don't think it's on to-night."

He spoke so huskily, too, and seemed so warm, that I could feel my heart go "thud, thud," like a pump.

"Why, what's up?" I says.

"Mate," he says, "there's two o' them Sydney ehaps in the watch as relieved us; and when I stopped you, I know I heard some one a stealing up the eompanion-ladder."

"Phew!" I says, very softly. "What shall we do?"

"Let the captain know," says Tom.

"If we can," I says; for something struck me that if it was as he said, we should be stopped.

"Ah! if we can," he says; and we slipped out quietly, and were both ready in a minute.

"Hadn't we better rouse up these chaps?" I said, for there was half a dozen down beside us.

"Wait a bit," says Tom; "p'raps it's only a hum after all."

So we stole under the hammocks to the ladder, and as I was first, I crept up, raised my head above the combings, and looked round, but did not see anything particular; so I crawled quietly on to the deck, and waited for Tom. He was aside me in a moment, and we were beginning to feel rather foolish, and to think we had both of us better go down, when, as we knelt elose under the shade of the long-boat, we heard a bit of a seuffle aft and then there was a faint ery, and a heavy plunge in the water, and then another cry, but fainter.

"Hush!" says Tom, grasping my arm; and then several dusky figures ran by us, seemingly barefooted, for you could hear the "pad, pad" of their feet on the deek, and directly after there was another short scuffly noise—the sound of some one trying to shout with a hand held over his mouth—and then another splash in the water.

"Come on," says Tom; and I followed him, and we crept along by the bulwark, and then darted down the cabin stairs, stopping a moment to listen, and then we heard them closing the hatch we had come up, and there was the souud of rope being piled on it.

We were at the bottom in an instant, when I was seized by the throat, and a voiee growled: "Who's this? What's the ship's course altered for?"

"Look out Mr. Smith," hissed Tom; "munity! they'll be here in a moment."

"Damd nonsense," roared the old fellow, pushing by us and running on deck! and as we banged at the captain's and Major Hortou's door, we heard a gurgling ery, an oath, and a heavy fall. Direetly after, there was a rush down the stairs; and as Major Horton's cabin door opened, some one struck me a tremendous blow on the head, and I fell; but was conscious enough to see the Major, with a light in one hand and a pistol in the other, send one fellow down; to hear the piercing sereams from the two poor girls whom I could not help; and then to hear the sound of shots and oaths, and blows in the captain's cabin, for a few moments; and then all was still, except the shrieks of the poor girls; while directly after more light was brought, and I saw lying across a ehair, with his head and legs upon the floor, the body of the poor old Major; and then all seemed to be blank for a bit.

The next thing I recollect was hearing Hicks' voice giving orders, and I heard him say "Over with him;" and then there was the sound of a heavy body being dragged along the floor of the next cabin, and then I heard the head go "bump, bump" up the cabin stairs; then scrape along the deck; and then eame a heavy plunge in the water.

"That's the poor skipper," I thinks to myself: and just then somebody walked right over me, and into the cabin, and I saw it was Hicks.

"Serve this old beast the same," he says; and Phillips and Johnson takes hold of the poor old gentleman's leg, and drags him along; and as they knocked the chair down, there was a cry from the inner cabin.

"Silenee!" roared Hicks, dashing the but-end of his pistol against the door; and then I felt the body drawn over me, and the warm blood drip on my face, and smear across it, as it was dragged along. Then followed the "bump, bump" of the head up the stairs; the creeping, rustling noise on the deck; and then a splash told me the poor old gentleman was gone.

Now, just then I was in a sort of sleepy, dreamy state—half-witted, I may say. I could see and understand all that passed, and yet did not seem either in pain or afraid. I remember thinking that it would be either my turn or else Tom Black's next; for I supposed he was knocked on the head too, and lying in the captain's cabin; and I remember, too, feeling very sorry for those two girls; and then two fellows caught hold of my legs, dragged me up the cabin stairs, across the deck, and then I felt some one give me a bit of a heave, and felt the shock as I struck the water; and then it was as if new life rushed through me, and as I rose to the surface, I struck out, and directly after felt the ship's side.

I suppose that one of the first things they must have done, and the thing which poor Tom and I heard, was to pitch the man at the wheel overboard; for the ship was rolling in the trough of the sea, very gently, for there was no breeze on; and very fortunate this was for me, as I was able to swim along the side and climb up on to the rudder-chains, where I had just strength enough to lash myself with my handkercher, when I turned dead-sick again, and nearly slipped back into the water. But, somehow or another, in a half-stupefied way, I managed to cling where I was, getting my legs well twisted round; and there I hung, drenched with the sea, shivering with the cold, but getting brighter and clearer in the head, which I now found was badly cut; but it soon stopped bleeding; and you may well suppose mine were not pleasant thoughts, holding on there under the stern of the ship—cold, and sick at heart, and waiting for the morning.

CHAPTER IV.

If any poor wretch ever longed for the coming of daylight, I was that poor fellow, as clung there feeling so weak and bad at times that I could have cried like a child; but after a bit I thought of my bacca, and got a bit in my mouth, and it did seem such a comfort. Being quite clear in my head now, and only in pain—pretty sharp pain, too, from the cut—I could think of all the events of the night without getting muddled and confused, as I did at first when I tried to; and now it seemed all clear enough, and just as poor Tom thought, for it was a deep-laid plot to get the treasure, and one which had succeeded only too well. And then I began to think about how many had been killed, and I counted up—two of the men in the watch; old Smith, the mate; the skipper; the poor old Major; and Tom Black, sir; and then I wondered whether they'd killed the poor girls; but at that same moment I thought about Hicks and Phillips, and a regular shudder, and a sense of going half mad, ran through me, so that for a few moments I felt half blind, as though blood ran to my eyes; and that's how I felt every time I thought of those two scoundrels.

The more I thought of the bloody deed of the past night, the more impossible it seemed; for though we used to hear tell of such things, and the old-salts knew many a pirate yarn, yet it didn't seem to belong to these times, and I almost fancied I was making a fool of myself.

But there was no deceit about it—worse luck—and soon I began to count up how many chaps were left; and I reckoned there'd be eight, "and not one of 'em as would turn pirate, I'd swear," I says to myself. And then I wondered what they'd do with them, for they were all caged up safe in the forecastle. "Why, they'll shove them in one of the quarter-boats with the ladies, and cast them adrift," I says.

Morning at last: first a faint light; then, a red glow; and then, up came the sun, seeming to make every wave a mass of jewels dancing in a flood of red gold, while the sky looked so assuring and sociable, that it seemed impossible that such a bloody deed should have been done in the darkness. Every warm ray served to cheer me up, and give me hope of life, till I thought again of what was to become of me; was I to be shot, or to fall off for the sharks, or be drowned, or what? But another glance at the warm sun and the bright sky cheered me on again: and I thought I'd wait till they sent the rest of the crew off in a boat, and then I'd swim off to them, and risk the sharks.

And now there seemed some moving about, for the rudder was shifted, and the ship made some way; but, directly after, it fell calm, and she swung round, so that I got the full glow of the warm sun, which began to dry me a bit, and warmed my stiffened and chilled limbs. Then I could hear them dashing water about, and swabbing the decks as busy as could be

"That's to get rid of the blood," I says, and soon after I hears a good deal of noise and talking, and swearing; and then there was a pistol-shot, and directly after a splash in the water. I saw a body and knew the face as that of a mate as had been in my watch—a good man, and true—at the same moment from above my head I heard a faint scream, and the whispering of voices, and then the closing of a window.

The sound of those voices revived me, so that I roused up, or I believe I should have slipped into the sea. I suppose I was weak from loss of blood, and besides I had never seen any horrors before; while there had been enough during the last few hours to upset any poor fellow. I must have gone: for I had tied my handkercher round my head, because the cut was painful.

By-and-by, I heard the boat lowered, and splash in the water; and after a bit, as if they were putting in provision and water, I heard her push off, and made ready for a swim, or else to shout to them. So I leaned out as far as I could, and watched till she came in sight; for I dared not let those on deck see me; but when at last I did see her, my heart seemed quite to sink, for there were only six men in her, and the young ladies were not there; while after a bit of study of the faces, I made out as it was the cook that was left behind.

"Poor gals, poor gals," I muttered to myself, and I shrunk back in the chains, and sat there thinking, and giving up all hope of going with the boat, for I didn't feel as if I could; and so, without seeing me, the poor chaps rowed away and at last got to be quite a little speck.

The heat of the day came and still it was calm; then the evening, and I had sat there with nothing to keep me but a bit of tobacco; and now I knew it would soon be sunset, for the sky was getting all glorious again. I had not heard any more of the young ladies though I fancied once the window opened, but from where I was, I could not climb up, nor yet see; and so I sat and waited meaning to climb on deck when it was dark, for I felt famished.

Every now and then, I could hear the fellows shouting and singing and it was evident that there was plenty of grog on the way. This set me thinking again about Hicks and Phillips and I could feel now as nothing was too bad for the villains: and I tried whether I could not climb up to the window where the ladies were, knowing all the time that I, single-handed, could do nothing. But I soon found out that I could not manage it, and made up my mind to wait till it was dark, when perhaps they could hang out something to help me.

I was sitting waiting for the night when all of a sudden I heard the window-glass up above me dashed out and the little pieces fell spattering into the water; and then I know for a few moments, I went mad and frothed at the mouth. Shriek after shriek, and the noise of struggling; prayers for mercy, help, pity, and all in the most heart-rending tones; the knocking together of furniture and breaking of glass; and still above all those pitiful cries for help, there came the angry voices of men and oaths; and once, I felt sure, blows; and still the cries continued, and all at once ceased. Then there was the loud banging of a door, and noise and swearing on the deck; and all the while I was holding my head tight against the side of the ship, to keep it from splitting, for it seemed as though my brain must burst through my skull.

After a bit I heard a loud wailing sob, and such a bitter cry as brought the pitying tears coursing down my rough cheeks' and that seemed to do me good, and I tried to make her as cried hear me. But I could not and then I listened again, and I heard a chocking voice say, "God! Father! forgive us, for we cannot live!" and then it was quite dark, and I heard in the stillness of the night those two sisters bidding one another good by, so sweetly and lovingly, and my tongue stuck to the roof of my mouth for a horrid chill ran through me, and I knew they were going to jump in. "Stop, stop," I cried at last in a voice that I didn't know for mine.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 12.

"Medicine Chests always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

In warring against the regular or Allopathic practice of medicine—in endeavoring to render it odious in the eyes of the people—in stigmatizing it as a system of cunning, fraud and crime—Dr. Bourne has no personal resentments or animosities to gratify; it is not its exponents but the system he is after. He believes that the course he is now pursuing in showing up that system by the opinions of its most distinguished professors, is not only legitimate but very effective in its effect upon the public mind.

In changing the programme for to-day, it is that still more damning proof may be brought forward in the following

REPORT OF A

TERRIBLE DEATH!

Communicated to the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal, Nov. 21, 1849, by Dr. Castle, an Apollathic physician of New York; which furnishes an illustration of Allopathic stupidity, ignorance and criminality too appropriate to my purpose to be overlooked, and unfortunately only too common to excite surprise in those whose duty it is to be conversant with such facts.

The Report is most circumstantial in its details, and aided by a medical writer of celebrity will be followed pretty closely. The subject was the well known reporter to Bennett's Herald, Dr. Houston, a man of nervous, sanguine temperament, very active, excitable, irritable: upon the impulse of the moment ready to perform the greatest action or to shrink from it in terror. Sept 4, 1849, at 4 o'clock A. M., was seized with a violent fit of coughing, and ejected from the lungs about 24 oz. blood. [32 oz. is regular butchery—Dr. B.] Salt and water administered by his family and the doctor sent for. Will he bleed? In the name of Apollathic stupidity, why should he bleed? The patient was already nearly dead from loss of blood. But hark! He comes! The Report says, "a vein in the arm was opened and about 24 oz. blood taken away!" "Laudanum to sustain the action of the heart was prescribed, in alternate doses every two hours, with tarter emetic and nitre for modifying any undue excitement upon the arterial system."

An ordinary bleeding, 12 oz.—full—large, 20. Why then this butchering waste of blood? Was Dr. H. a robust, hearty man in a high fever, full of active inflammation, abounding in surplus strength and excess of action, which required reducing? Hear, oh hear the Report! "Dr. Houston's position appeared to be most critical. In addition to the loss of 24 oz. blood from pulmonary exudation, his system was collapsed, his face and hands, and skin cold, corrugated, pale, and of a peculiar purple hue!" All the indications of advanced cholera! Why did he bleed? God pity the infatuation that can draw indications for bleeding from any of those symptoms. The Report says that "for some time the patient had labored under a fearful presentiment that he would die on the 15th Sept., and that he was living under the dread of a cholera atmosphere, and had been living and drinking freely to overcome his horror and depression." Could that furnish a reason for bleeding? The Report tells us "he was of strumous diathesis," or delicate, frail and feeble organization. The very last condition of humanity which should invite a blood-thirsty doctor's appetite.

Dr. Dixon's Scalpel has for its motto—"Nature is ever busy, by the silent operation of her own forces, endeavoring to overcome and cure disease. Her medicines are air, food, water, sleep. Their use is directed by instinct. And that man is most worthy the name of physician who most reveres her unerring laws." Should not Dr. Dixon have said, "bleeding, laudanum, tartar emetic, nitre?" By instinct leeches bleed, but not to relieve our maladies.

Dr. Houston is now fairly started. Let us see how he progresses. Laudanum has been given to sustain the action of the heart. But why? Because of the bleeding. Thus attempting to undo with one hand what the other has just done! Then again tartar emetic and nitre are alterated with the laudanum. Why? To keep down the action of the heart—introducting a third force to overcome the second as the second the first. Had the doctor been administering to a tan-vat he might have chanced the ruin of his hides.

A powerful bleeding to reduce arterial action; laudanum to stimulate and arouse it again; tartar emetic and nitre two deadly debilitating drugs—to prevent the opium from having the very effect for which it was given. Not a solitary reason save those above named, is assigned for this practice, therefore it is strictly logical, that if no laudanum had been given, no tartar emetic and nitre would have been required; and if bleeding had been let alone then no opium would have been necessary.

Three days have lapsed. No alternation in medication. We have added, as a beverage, toast water, and as nourishment, an occasional spoonful of arrow root. On the fourth night the Report states—"about 8 oz. blood were expectorated. The old puncture in the arm was again opened and from 12 to 16 oz. blood abstracted from the circulation!" This is on the system of competition, surely. The recipe must read this: for dangerous bleeding at the lungs, take once and a half, to twice from the arm! Or, if a man cut his foot with an axe and bleed three quarts, until he is collapsed, corrugated, cold and blue, nearly dead, bleed three quarts more and—finish him!

Four days more of laudanum, tartar emetic and nitre, making seven in all, after two copious bleedings from disease, and two far more so by the doctor. Nourishment, toast-water and arrow root. Of course he grows worse, but is hard to kill.

Now he begins to see sights: before, he had only felt them. "Passed a restless night and complained of insects and reptiles being on the bed," says the Report.

Sept. 12. Pulse 140. Catches at imaginary objects: worst kind of symptoms in all respects. Now the doctors (more than one now,) have surely determined that they have had enough of this practice; let us see. 13th Sept., symptoms same. Medicines as usual! Six P. M., glass of iced water with a teaspoonful of brandy. "Patient revived a little." Mark—this is the first drop of water and that slightly spoiled by the brandy. Eight P. M. "Patient restless; mustard poultice applied over the stomach." Oh! cruel! 10 P. M., 60 drops laudanum. 12 P. M., tarter metic and nitre! in increased doses! Depend on it he now quickens his speed! He travels fast! Sept.—14, one A. M. Pulse 160! Delirium increased, 4 and 6 P. M. active cathartics: Laudanum, tartar emetic, nitre, "as usual," with poisonous reptiles, "as usual." 15th, worse—medicines and sights as usual."

16th. Lucid intervals only momentary. The Report now says his fever partook of the typhoid character. Such it was from the first. Toast-water and beef tea were now discontinued and beefsteak and brandy ordered. Beefsteak and brandy for a dying man! He now sees "hideous monsters." He has had brandy you will observe, and the doctor was not the first, nor unfortunatly will he be the last, for whom brandy has created "hideous monsters." 17th, 8 A. M. Council of doctors. Blister on the abdomen, Medicines "as usual." 11 P. M. In a state of wildest excitement—uttering the most piercing exclamations! He attacked his attendants and required the exercise of physical force to keep him in bed. 11½, expired! Could it be otherwise? Nineteen hours after death, a post mortem examination was made, and no evidence existed that Dr. Houston died of any recognized disease. The only admormal condition which could be detected was styled "a drenched apoplexy of the lungs!" a most lucid idea, truly, to express a simple fact that there was a extensive effusion of serum into the cellular tissue and air cells of the lungs, induced by the extreme relaxation of the exhalents in the act of dying. The Report says "auscultation denoted no congestion," etc. So that if the lungs had been in a condition of "drenched apoplexy" during life, auscultation would have denoted universal congestion.

There was nothing necessarily fatal about this case; and the conclusion is irresistible that Dr. Houston died of "bleeding, laudanum, tartar emetic and nitre."

Observe, that in this case of burning fever and delirium, there was no bathing, washing, not even sponging the body with water: not a drop of water to drink. Not in the hidden recesses of the farther mountains—not buried in the depths of some vast wilderness, shut out from the acquisition of all possible light and knowledge, was this deed of ignorance and barbarism performed—No! but under the auspices of Europe and America—in the city of New York in the year 1849. Is there a just God? And shall such atrocious deeds escape their due recompense?

And now comes the question—would such treatment be administered on the threshold of 1867? Has not medical practice been reformed? Dr. Bourne answers that he believes atrocities equally as damnable have been perpetrated by medical men within the current month of December 1866. Reform in medical practice! Oh simpleton to entertain the thought! Reform in medicine must begin with the people, whose utter refusal to be tortured and trifled with, will alone force upon the regulars an abandonment of their detestable errors and criminal mal-practice, in so many cases. Why use medicines when disease can be cured by food, water and proper habits? as an experience of twenty-five years has proven to the satisfaction of Dr Bourne who has made thousands of converts to his views, ready to testify to all the blessings they have experienced, and that they have forever abandoned the drug system and drug doctors.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

THE "UNCLEAN BOOK."

MR. SWINBURNE'S pamphlet entitled Notes on Poems and Reviews, in reply to his critics, has provoked by its tone of anger and defiance, a renewal of the attack with increased bitterness by a number of the London Journals. In answer to what the poet says in defence of Anactoria, namely that it was simply an attempt to render in English the spirit of the celebrated Second Ode of Sappho, the London Review says:

"Now we all know very well the nature of that Ode, and it is preposterous to allege in defence of a modern poet that it is written in the spirit of that ecstasy of insane passion. Such a plea only makes the offence worse, as it still more clearly shows what was the living author's intention and leading idea in the composition of his poem. In God's name—or, if that seem to Mr. Swinburne a superstitious adjuration, in the name of plain human reason and sense—what is the use of searching for the materials of poetry in house? Grant that Sappho made a wonderful poem out of a grevious aberration; is that any reason why a modern Englishman should seek to rival her in her Bedlam flights of erotieism? Mr. Swinburne says he despaired of translating the original, and, beng disturbed that such a marvelious revelation of mental and moral disease should be lost to English poetry, he 'tried instead to reproduce in a diluted and dilated form the spirit of a poem which could not be reprodueed in the body.' Now, this very 'dilution' increases the evil. Sappho's Ode is at any rate short, sharp, and sudden, and may be supposed (which is the greatest excuse that can be made for it) to have been wrung from her during an interval of hysterieal emotion. It bursts out, wild, quivering, involuntary, and is straightway silent for ever. On the other hand, the author of 'Atalanta in Calydon,' without even the palliation of a suffering however abnormal, or a desire however demented, deliberately sit down, and produces in cold blood an elaborate study of diseased passion. What Sappho has dismissed in the briefest form, Mr. Swinburne expands into a poem of 305 lines. His production is really far worse than its prototype, because it is more self-conscious, mingling the intelleet with the senses in a vieious union. Where the Lesbian simply cried out with an intolerable and monstrous pain, Mr. Swinburne investigates with a literary zest. He analyses, he curiously inquires, he lingers round every detail, he eontemplates his ease of morbid anatomy from every conceivable point of view; he exhausts the language of wantonness, and recruits himself in a riot of blasphemy. The latter, indeed, is an offence of which poor Sappho herself seems never to have been guilty, and it is therefore a perfectly gratuitious addition by Mr. Swinburne from his own mental stock. As regards his blasphemies, by the way, he seeks a refuge which will not avail him. He refers to the writings of Shelley, and more particularly to the 'Queen Mab.' The referenee is unfortunate. In the first place, Shelley, in his riper years, repudiated that poem, and sought an injunction in Chancery against its surreptitious publieation; in the second place, Shelley's opposition to established dogmas was undertaken with a grave and serious purpose. in the excellence of whieh there can be no doubt that he sincerely and devotedly believed. Whether he was right or wrong is nothing to the present argument. He had persuaded himself that the miseries of the world were mainly owing to certain opinions in religion and morals, and he eame forward as a reformer, to challenge those opinions, and to supplant them, if he could, with others whieh he regarded as more reasonable. Mr. Swinburne does nothing of the sort. He gives the service of his genius to no scheme, whether true or false, whether practicable or Quixotic, for the emancipation of mankind; he does not question any system of faith or morals, be it good or bad; he simply raves and curses. This is not only shocking; it is silly and boyish, because purposeless."

The Saturday Review takes the matter more calmly, though it is also inclined to find the guilty of sinning against the decencies and respectabilities. Mr. Rossetti, having come into the critical arena in the role of "Philo—Swinburne," and published an elaborate discussion of the charges brought against his friend and client, the journal last named, thus pleasantly comments upon the "situation:"

"It was quite right that the other side of the great Swinburnian controversy should be represented, and well represented. It was quite clear also that Mr. Swinburne was not able to do this for himself. The sad exhibition he made reeently in the way of self-defence almost disarmed even his enemies. Not only did he fail in the matter, but still more in the manner, of his vindication. Anything more harsh, ereaking, and unmelodious probably never came from a true poet's pen His tuneful voice was turned to the shrillest of screams, to which not the soft chords of his wonderful lyre, but the miaulings of a frenzied bagpipe, served as accompaniment. However, he is one of those to whom much will always be forgiven, and, we may add, who will always want all the forgiveness they can get. At the same time, we admit with all frankness that no critic worthy of the name supposes for a moment that any verdict arrived at, now or for some time to come, can in any sense be final. We remember the nonsense that was written about Shelley, and Keats, and Wordsworth; and we think it ought to make others, as we confess it makes us, cautious and grave. For good or for evil, the poems of Mr. Swinburne are a fact in English literature. And no hysterics or vapours will avail to send them out of it. As an able and well-weighed effort to assist and hasten the calm judgment of the future, we think Mr. Rossetti's criticism deserves praise."

The Reviewer thinks that Mr. Swinburne manifests an altogether exceptional poetic power when treative of forbidden subject, and that in Anactoria, which even Ms. Rossetti admits to be indefensible, he reaches the high-water mark of his inspiration. "Mr. Swinburne," he sums up, "can write on these topics as he can write on no other. And it comes to this—we must either ignore the most Swinburnian things he has ever writen, or admit him to be the most gifted, if not also the most indecent of erotie poets."

We do not propose, at present, to express our opinion on the question of the "deeency," or as the Bulletin phrases it, the "eleanness" of the poems. They are beyond all question "unclean" to the unclean. The prurient imagination, in search of food for prurient reverie, will be sure to find what it seeks for in this volume. So far as the charge of "blasphemy" is concerned, the following passage would secure a conviction before any tribunal in Christendom;

> Lo she was thus when her clear limbs enticed
> All lips that now grow sad with kissing Christ,
> Stained with the blood fallen from the feet of God,
> The feet and hands whereat our souls were pierced.
> Alas Lord, surely thou art great and fair,
> But lo her wonderfully woven hair!
> And thou didst heal us with thy piteous kiss;
> But see now, Lord; her mouth is lovelier.
> She is right fair: what has she done to thee?
> Nay, fair Lord Christ, lift up thine eyes and see:
> Had now thy mother such a lip—like this?
> Thou knowest how sweet a thing it is to me.

The following lines express more powerfully than it has ever been expressed before, at least in English verse, the sense of the terrible sway of unsympathizing law of fate and "Necessity" in the universe. To many they will seem impious—but they are, nevertheless, wonderfully powerful:

> For who shall change with prayers and thanksgivings
> The mystery of the cruelty of things?
> Or say what God ahove all gods and years
> With offering and blood and sacrifice of tears,
> With lamentation from strange lands, from graves
> Where the snake pastures, from scarred mouths of slaves,
> From prison, and from plunging prows of ships.
> Through flame-like foam of the sea's closing lips—
> With thwarting of strange signs, and wind-blown hair
> Of comets, desolating the mid air,
> When darkness is made fast by seals and bars
> And fierce reluctance of disastrous stars,
> Eclipse, and sound of shaken hills, and wings
> Darkening, and blind inexplicable things—
> With sorrow of laboring moons, and altering light
> And travail of the planets of the night,
> And weeping of the weary Pleiad's seven,
> Feeds the mute, melancholy lust of heaven.

The New York Weekly Review says that Mr. R. H. Stoddard has withdrawn from the regular editorial staff of the Round Table. Mr. Stoddard's department of that paper was the "Library Gossip," concerning American and English books and writers, and it constituted one of its most interesting and valuable features. The Review says: "The high tone and pure taste, which have constantly marked this department, furnish a guarantee, if any were needed, that Mr. Stoddard is in no way responsible for the unjust personal attacks and the misrepresentation of American society which have procured for the Round Table an unenviable distinction."

The following is a complete list of the works of Thackeray: "The History of Pendennis;" "The Newcomes;" "The History of Henry Esmond, Esq.;" "The Virginians;" "Vanity Fair;" "The Adventures of Philip on his way through the World;" "The Kickleburgs on the Rhine;" "Lovell the Widower;" "The Rose and the Ring;" "The Four Georges;" "The English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century;" "The Paris Sketch Book;" "Denis Duval"—unfinished; "The Irish Sketch Book;" "Roundabout Papers;" "The Great Hoggarty Diamonds;" "The History of Samuel Titmarsh;" "Mrs. Perkins' Ball;" "Dr. Birch and his Young Friends;" "Our Street"—a book of Ballads; and several volumes of Miscellanies, including the famous "Book of Snobs" and "Yellowplush Papers."

Bayard Taylor, has, it is said, been engaged by the Atlantic Monthly to make a fresh trip to Europe, and write a series of papers for that periodical.

Oliver Wendell Holmes is writing a novel for the Atlantic. The first part of it will be published in the January number. It is called "The Guardian Angel." It is a story of New England life.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's "Chimney Corner Papers" will be gathered into a volume and published soon. She is now occupied on a novel for the Atlantic.

A new weekly serial has been started in London, called Country Words, being "a North of England Magaziue of Literature, Science and Art.

Henry Ward Beecher is said to be engaged to write a serial work for Bonner's Ledger, to commence in January—quite a line of business for him.

Emerson's new volume of poems, which will be issued before Christmas, is entitled "May Day and Other Pieces."

James Russell Lowell is writiug a series of articles, in prose and verse, for the Atlantic, to be published next year. The statement that he is engaged on a novel is incorrect.

At an exhibition recently held in the city of Toledo, one of the objects shown was a complete edition of "Don Quixote," printed in microscopic characters, on fifty-four cigarettee papers, in four volumes.

The Eastern papers state that twenty-seven thousand copies of Jean Ingelow's poems have been sold in the United States. The fact is highly creditable to American taste and appreeiation.

Mrs. Wood, the author of "East Lynne," is writing a story of school life, entitled "The Orvill College Boys."

AMUSEMENTS.

MAGUIRE'S OPERA HOUSE.—On Saturday night a dramatization by a member of our city press, of Miss Braddon's novel entitled the Captain of the Vulture, was produced. A large audienee was present and the play went off satisfactorily, though it was a little "too talky" in some parts. On Monday the same play was produced, ruthlessly cut down, improved in some parts and ruined in others. The "carpenters' scenes" were clumsily managed and were not artistieally "dove-tailed" into the piece. Everyone who witnessed the performanee of this piece awarded great credit to the author for the artistic skill evinced in the arrangement of the last act, which was by far the best in the play. Millicent's Husband was put on the stage very well, and the snow storm in the second act was very effectively rendered. On Tuesday evening the extravaganza of Ali Baba, or, Forty Thieves, was produced. This piece was capitally played throughout; Lady Don made a most excruciatingly comical swell 'Abdallah,' and sang charmingly. Harry Jackson's impersonaton of 'Morgiana' was extremely funny and drew roars of laughter from the audience. On Monday Arrah-na-Pogne, the most popular play ever produced in San Francisco, will be presented, with Lady Don as 'Arrah Meelish,' George Pauneefort in his origiual character of 'The O'Grady,' H. D. Thompson in the character which he has made peculiarly his own—'Michael Freeney'—Mrs. Harry Jaekson as 'Fanny Power,' and the rest of the characters by the company. This play will be produced with all the original scenery and a numerous corps of supernumeraries.

SACRED CONCERT.—Rowland Hill when remonstrated with for allowing the congregation in his conventicle to sing pslams to profane melodies retorted: "I don't see any reason why the devil should monopolize all the pretty tunes." This was a very smart remark of Rowland Hill's, but it was not founded on fact. Much of the most beautiful music ever composed, has been adapted to words which set forth the glory of the Almighty. Sacred music has been hitherto, somewhat negleeted in San Francisco. To-morrow evening, M. and Mme. Heine will give a grand sacred concert at the Metropolitan Theatre. On this occasion Rossini's masterpiece, "Stabat Mater," will be presented. Miss Emma Howson has been engaged, and will sing Bauer's "Ave Maria." Miss Clelia Howson, the contralto, whose voice has been heard to so much advantage in secular music, will sing the beautiful arietta. "Oh, rest in the Lord," from Elijah. M. Heine will perform several of his most famous violin solos; Henri Herberte will sing the splendid aria, "Be thou Faithful unto Death;" John Howson, Frank A. Howson, R. Wunderlich and others, will assist in producing gems from Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Hayden and other grand masters, and a rich treat may be anticipated.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The wonderful Japanese gymnasts are about to take their departure for the World's Fair at Paris. The feats which they perform, have been pronounced "miraculous" by all who have witnessed them. To-night they close their engagement at the Academy of Music and so as a matter of course the house will be crowded. The tremendous ladder feat is of itself almost sufficiently surprising to warraut a trip to Japan to witness it.

THE HOWSON TROUPE and the Martinettis are playing at the Metropolitan to ordinary business. The Martinettis lowered their professional name, as well as that of the theatre, by giving a public masked ball last night, after their usual performance. The less of these affairs that occur there, the better it will be for the reputation of both.

By a curious coineidenee it appears that the coming year (1867) has been fixed upon by Mahommedans, Brahmins and various other sects, as well as some few Christians, as a period in the history of the universe to be marked by some great and marvelous change.

William Blake's Poems—the most complete edition—have just been published in London.

ASPHALTUM PAVEMENTS are being laid in front of many of our principal buildings. The Pacific Asphaltum Company, Mr. M. E. Fitzgibbon Superintendent, have just laid an Asphaltum sidewalk in front of the new Bank of California, corner of Sansome and California streets. The success of this Company in controlling the majority of the city work, is their best advertisement. The above mentioned job surpasses any work of the kind heretofore done in San Francisco. The floor of the interior of the Bank will be of the same material. The finest brick pavement was laid in front of the Lick House about five years ago, which is now in so bad a condition that it is shortly to be removed and an Asphaltum pavement laid down in place of it, as being the cheapest and most durable of pavements.

REMOVING TO KEARNEY STREET.—Frisboe & Scott's Music and Piano salesroom has been removed from No. 3 Montgomery street to 139 Kearney street, corner of Sutter. The agency of the Howe Sewing Machines has also been removed from the same locality to 137 Kearney street.

DR. FONDA—an oculist of high repute, and for the last seventeen years Principal of the La Fayette, (Ind.) Eye Infirmary—has established an Infirmary for the exclusive treatment of diseases of the eyes, at 223 Kearney street, in this city.

THE SHADOW OF DEATH.

THE old woman gave no alarm, called for no assistance, but silently and steadily applied herself to recalling Mrs. Carruthers to consciousness. She had no fear of interruption. Mr. Carruthers invariably went direct to the breakfast-room on returning from his morning tour of inspection, and Clare would not visit Mrs. Carruthers in her own apartment unasked. So Mrs. Brookes set the windows and doors wide open, and let the sweet morning air fan the insensible face, while she applied all the remedies at hand. At length Mrs. Carruthers sighed deeply. opened her eyes, and raised her hand to her forehead, where it came in contact with the wet hair.

"Hush, my dear," said Mrs. Brookes, as she made an almost inarticulate attempt to speak. "Do not try to say anything yet. Lie quite still, until you are better."

Mrs. Carruthers closed her eyes again and kept silent. When, after an interval, she began to look more life-like, the old woman said, softly.

"You must not give way again like this, for George's sake. I don't care about his wearing the coat. I know it looks bad, but it is a mistake, I am quite sure. Don't I know the boy as well as yon do, and maybe better, and don't I know his tender heart, with all his wildness, and that he never shed a fellow-creature's blood in anger, or for any other reason. But it's plain he is suspected—not he, for they don't know him, thank God, but the man that wore the coat, and we must warn him, and keep it from master. Master would go mad, I think, if anything like suspicion or disgrace came of Master George, more than the disgrace he thinks the poor boy's goings on already. You must keep steady and composed, my dear, and yon must write to him. Are you listening to me? Do you understand me?" asked the old woman, anxiously, for Mrs. Carruthers' eyes were wild and wandering, and her hand twitched convulsively in her grasp.

"Yes, yes," she murmured, "But I tell you, Ellen, he wore the coat—my boy wore the coat."

"And I tell yon, I don't care whether he wore the coat or not," repeated Mrs. Brookes, emphatically. He can explain that, no doubt of it; but he must be kept out of trouble. and you must be kept out of trouble, and the only way to do that, is to let him know what brought the strange gentleman to Poynings, and what he and master found out. Remember, he never did this thing, but, my dear, he has been in bad hands lately, you know that; for haven't you suffered in getting him out of them, and I don't say but that he may be mixed up with them that did. I'm afraid there can't be any doubt of that, and he must be warned. Try and think of what he told you about himself, not only just now, but when he came here before, and you will see some light, I am sure."

But Mrs. Carruthers could not think of anything. could not remember anything, could see no light. A deadly horrible conviction had seized upon her, iron fingers clutched her heart, a faint sickening terror held her captive, in body and spirit; and as the old woman gazed at her, and found her incapable of answering, the fear that her mistress was dying then and there before her eyes took possession of her. She folded up the newspaper which had fallen from Mrs. Carruthers' hand, npon the bed, replaced it in her pocket, and rang the bell for Dixon.

"My mistress is very ill," she said. when Dixon entered the room. "You had better go and find master, and send him here. Tell him to send for Dr. Munns at once."

"Dixon gave a frightened, sympathising glance at the figure on the bed, over which the old woman was bending with such kindly solicitude, and then departed on her errand. She found Mr. Carruthers still in the breakfast-room. He was seated at the table, and held in his hand a newspaper, from which he had evidently been reading, when Dixon knocked at the door; for he was holding it slightly aside, and poising his gold eye glass in the other hand, when the woman entered. Mr. Carruthers was unaccustomed to being disturbed, and he did not like it, so that it was in a tone of some impatience that he said:

"Well, Dixon, what do you want?"

"If you please, sir," replied Dixon, hesitatingly, my mistress is not well."

"So I hear," returned her master; "She sent word she did not mean to appear at breakfast. He said it rather huffily, for not to appear at breakfast was, in Mr. Carruthers' eyes, not to have a well-regulated mind, and not to have a well-regulated mind was very lamentable and shocking indeed.

"Yes, sir," Dixon went on, "but I'm afraid she's very ill indeed. She has been fainting this long time, sir, and Mrs. Brookes can't bring her to at all. She sent me to ask you to send for Dr. Munns at once, and will you have the gooduess to step up and see my mistress, sir?"

"God bless my soul," said Mr. Carruthers, pettishly, but rising as he spoke, and pushing his chair away. "This is very strange: she has been exposing herself to cold, I suppose. Yes, yes, go on and tell Mrs. Brookes I am coming, as soon as I send Gibson for Dr. Munns.

Dixon left the room, and Mr. Carruthers rang the bell, and desired that the coachman should attend him immediately. When Dixon had entered the breakfast-room, Clare Carruthers had been standing by the window, looking out on the garden, her back turned towards her uncle. She had not looked round once during the colloquy between her uncle and his wife's maid, but had remained quite motionless. Now Mr. Carruthers turned to address her.

"Clare," he said. But his niece was no longer in the room; she had softly opened the French window, and passed into the flower-garden, carrying among the sweet, opening flowers of the early summer, and into the serene air, a face which might have vied in its rigid trrror with the face up stairs. When Mr. Carruthers had come in that morning, and joined Clare in the pretty breakfast-room, he was in an unusually pleasant mood, and had greeted his niece with uncommon kindness, He had found everything in good order out of doors. No advantage had been taken of his absence to neglect the inexorable sweepings and rollings, the clippings and trimmings, the gardening and grooming. So Mr. Carruthers was in good humor in consequence, and also because he was still nourishing the secret sense of his own importance, which had sprung up in his magisterial breast, under the flattering influence of Mr. Dalrymple's visit. So when he saw Clare seated before the breakfast equipage, looking in her simple, pretty morning dress as fair and bright as the morning itself, and when he received an intimation that he was not to expect to see his wife at breakfast, he recalled the resolutiou he had made last night, and determined to broach the snbject of Mr. Dalrymple's visit to his niece without delay.

He talked to Clare in a pleasant tone, and presently asked her if she had been looking at the London papers during the last few days. Clare replied that she seldom read auything beyond the deaths, births, and marriages, and an occasional leader, and had not read even so much while she had been at the Sycamores.

"Why do you ask, uncle?" she said. "Is there any particular news?"

"Why, yes, there is," replied Mr. Carruthers, pompously. "There is a matter attracting public attention just now in which I am, strange to say, a good deal interested—in which responsibility has been laid on me, indeed, in a way which, though flattering—very flattering indeed—is, at the same time, embarrassing."

Mr. Carruthers became more and more pompous with every word he spoke. Clare could not repress a disrespectful notion that he bore an absurd resemblance to the turkey-cock, whose struttings and gobblings had often amused her in the poultry-yard, as he mouthed his words and moved his chin about in his stiff and spotless cravat. His niece was rather surprised by the matter of his discourse, as she was not accustomed to associate the idea of importance to society at large with Mr. Carruthers of Poynings, and cherished a rather settled conviction that, mighty potentate as he was within the handsome gates of Poynings, the world outside wagged very independently of him. She looked up at him with an expression of interest and also of surprise, but fortunately she did not give utterance to the latter and certainly predominant sentiment.

"The fact is," said Mr. Carruthers, "a murder has been committed in London under very peculiar circumstances. It is a most mysterious affair, and the only solntion of the mystery hitherto suggested is that the motive is political."

He paused, cleared his throat, once more settled his chin comfortably, aud went on, while Clare listened, wondering more and more how such a matter could affect her uncle. She was a gentle-hearted girl, but not in the least silly, and quite free from any sort of affectation; so she expressed no horror or emotion at the mere abstract idea of the murder, as a more young-ladyish young lady would have done.

"Yes, uncle?" she said, simply, as he paused.

Mr. Carruthers continued:

"The murdered man was found by the river-side, stabbed, and robbed of whatever money and jewellery he had possessed. He was a good-looking man, young, and evidently a foreigner; but there was no means of identifying the body, and the inquest was adjourned—in fact, is still adjourned."

"What an awful death to come by, in a strange country!" said Clare, solemnly. "How dreadful to think that his friends and relatives will perhaps never know his fate! But how did they know the poor creature was a foreigner, uncle?"

"By his dress, my dear. It appears he had on a fur-lined coat, with a hood—quite a foreign article of dress; and the only person at the inquest able to throw any light on the crime was a writer at an eating-house in the Strand, who said that the murdered man had dined there on a certain evening—last Thursday, I believe—and had worn the fur coat, and spoken in a peculiar squeaky voice. The waiter felt sure he was not an Englishman, though he spoke good English. So the inquest was adjourned in order to get more evidence, if possible, as to the identity of the murdered man, and also that of the last person who had been seen in his company. And this brings me to the matter in which I am interested."

Clare watched her uncle with astonishment as he rose from his chair and planted himself upon the hearth rug before the fireplace, now adorned with its summer ornaments of plants aud flowers, and drapped in muslin. Taking up the familiar British attitude, and looking, if possible, more than ever pompous, Mr. Carruthers proceeded:

"You will be surprised to learn, Clare, that the visit of the gentleman who came here yesterday, and with whom I went out, had reference to this murder."

"How, uncle?" exclaimed Clare. "What on earth have you, or has any one here, to do with it?"

"Wait until I have done, and yon will see," said Mr. Carruthers, in a tone of stately rebuke. "The last person seen in the company of the man alterwards found murdered, and who dined with him at the tavern, wore a coat which the waiter who recognised the body had chanced to notice particularly. The appearance of this person the man failed in describing with much distinctness, but he was quite positive about the coat, which he had taken from the man and hung up on a peg with his own hands. And now, Clare, I am coming to the strangest part of this strange story."

The girl listened much interested indeed, and with attention, but still wondering how her uncle could be involved in the matter, and perhaps feeling a little impatient at the slowness with which, in his self-importance, he told the story.

"I was much surprised," continued Mr. Carruthers, "to find in the gentleman who came here yesterday, and whose name was Dalrymple, an emissary from the Home Office, entrusted by Lord Wolstenholme with a special mission to me" —impossible to describe the pomposity of Mr. Carruthers' expression and utterance at this point—"to me. He came to request me to assist him in investigating this most intricate and important case. It is not a mere police case, you must understand, my dear. The probability is that the murdered man is a political refugee, and that the crime has been perpetrated" (Mr. Carruthers brought out the word with indescribable relish) "by a member of one of the secret societies in revenge lor the defection of the victim, or in apprehension of his betrayal of the canse."

"What cause, uncle?" asked Clare, innocently. She was not of a sensational turn of mind, had no fancy for horrors as horrors, and was getting a little tired of her uncle's story.

"God knows, my dear; some of their liberty, fraternity, and equality nonesense, I suppose. At all events, this is the supposition, and to ask my aid in investigating the only clue in the possession of the government was the object of Mr. Dalrymple's visit yesterday. The man who was seen in the company of the murdered man by the waiter at the tavern, aud who went away with him, wore a coat made by Evans of Amherst. You know him, Clare, the old man who does so much of our work here. I went to his shop with Mr. Dalrymple, and we found out all about the coat. He remembered it exactly, by the description, and told us when he had made it, two years ago, and when he had sold it, six weeks ago, to a person who paid for it with a ten-pound note with the Post-office stamp upon it. The old man is not very bright, however, for though he remembered the circumstance, and found the date in his daybook, he could not give anything like a description of the man who had bought the coat He could only tell us, in general terms, that he would certainly know him again, if he should see him; but he talked about a rather tall young man, neither stout nor thin, neither ugly nor handsome, dark-eyed and dark haired, in short, the kind of description which describes nothing. We came away as wise as we went, except in the matter of the date of the purchase of the coat. That does not help much towards the detection of the murderer, as a coat may change hands many times in six weeks, if it has been originally bought by a dubious person. The thing would have been to establish a likeness between the man described by Evans, as the purchaser of the coat, and the man described by the waiter as the wearer of the coat at the tavern. But both descriptions are very vague."

"What was the coat like?" asked Clare, in a strange, deliberate tone.

"It was a blue Witney overcoat, with a label inside the collar, bearing Evans' name. The waiter at the tavern, where the murdered man dined, had read the name, and remembered it. This led to their sending to me, and my being known to the authorities as a very active magistrate" (here Mr. Carruthers swelled and pouted again with importance), "they naturally communicated with me. The question is, now, how I am to justify the very flattering confidence which Lord Wolstenholme has placed in me. It is a difficult question, and I have been considering it maturely. Mr. Dalrymple seems to think the clue quite lost. But I am not disposed to let it rest; I an determined to set every possible engine at work to discover whether the description given by the waiter, and that given by Evans, tally with one another."

"You said the inquest was adjourned, I think," said Clare.

"Yes, until to-day; but Mr. Dalrymple will not have learned anything. There will be an open verdict." (Here Mr. Carruthers condescendingly explained to his niece the meaning of the term.) "And the affair will be left to be unravelled in time. I am anxious to do all I can towards that end; it is a duty I owe to society, to Lord Wolstenholme, and to myself."

Clare had risen from her chair, and approached the window. Her uncle could not see her face, as he resumed his seat at the breakfast table, and opened his letters in his usual deliberate and dignified manner. Clare Carruthers turned her head from the window, and furtively watched her uncle during their perusal.

"I dare say we shall find something about the business in this," he said addressing his niece, as he took up a newspaper, but without turning his head in her direction. "Ah, I thought so; here it is. 'Mysterious circumstance, extraordinary supineness and stupidity of the police; no one arrested on suspicion; better arrest the wrong man, and tranqualise the public mind, than to arrest no one at all.' I'm not convinced by that reasoning, I must say. What? No reason for regarding this murder as a political assassination? Listen to this Clare; and he read aloud, while she stood by the window, her back turned towards him, and she listened, intently, greedily, with a terrible fear and sickness at her heart:

"'The supposition that this atrocious crime has been committed from political motives has, in our opinion, no foundation in probability, and derives little support from common sense. The appearance of the body, the firmness of the linen, the expensive quality of the attire, the torn condition of the breast and sleeves of the shirt, which seems plainly to indicate that studs, probably of value, had been wrenched violently out, the extreme improbability that an individual, so handsomely dressed as the murdered man, would have been out without money in his pocket, all indicate robbery at least; and if perhaps more than robbery, certainly not less, to have been the motive of the crime An absurd theory has been founded upon a peculiarity in the dress of the victim, and upon a remark made by the only witness at the inquest about his tone of voice. Nothing is more likely, in our opinion than a complete miscarriage of justice in this atrocious case. Suspicion has been arbitrarily directed in one channel, and the result will be probably, the total neglect of other and more likely ones. While the political murderer is being theorised about and "wanted," the more ordinary criminal, the ruffian who kills for gain, and not for patriotism or principle, is as likely as not to escape comfortably, and enjoy his swag in some pleasant, unsuspected, and undisturbed retreat.'

"Now, I call this unjustifiable," said Mr. Carruthers, in a tone of dignified remonstrance and indignation. "Really the liberty of the press is going quite too far. The government are convinced that the murder is political, and I can't see—"

It was at this point of Mr. Carruthers' harangue that he was interrupted by his wife's maid. When he again looked for Clare, she had disappeared, nor did he or any of the frightened and agitated household at Ponynings see the young lady again for many hours. Dr. Munns arrived and found Mr. Carruthers considerably distressed at the condition in which Mrs. Carruthers was, also a little annoyed at that lady's want of consideration in being ill, and unable to refrain from hinting, with much reserve and dignity of manner, that he was at present more than usually engaged in business of the last importance, which rendered it peculiarly unfortunate that he should have any additional care imposed on him—public importance, he took care to explain, and no less onerous than mysterious. But the worthy gentleman's pride and pompousness were soon snubbed by the extreme gravity of Dr. Munn's manner, as he answered his inquiries and put questions in his turn relative to his patient. The doctor was both alarmed and puzzled by Mrs. Carruthers' state. He told her husband she was very seriously ill; he feared brain fever had set in. Could Mr. Carruthers account for the fever in any way? No, Mr. Carruthers could not; neither could the housekeeper, nor Mrs. Carruthers' maid, both of whom were clearly questioned, as having more and more frequent access to that lady's presence than any other members of the household.

Had Mrs. Carruthers heard any distressing intelligence? had she received a shock of any kind? the doctor inquired. Mr. Carruthers appeared to sustain one from the question. Of course not; certainly not; nothing of the kind, he replied, with some unrepressed irritation of manner, and secretly regarded the bare suggestion of such a possibility as almost indecent. Mrs. Carruthers of Poynings receive shocks indeed! The doctor, who knew and disregarded his peculiarities, calmly pursued his inquiries undeterred by Mr. Carruthers' demeanor, and, finding that nothing particular had happened, acknowledged that, there being no apparent cause to which so sudden and serious an illness could be attributed, he was the more uneasy as to its probable result. Then Mr. Carruthers caught the infection of his alarm, and all the best side of his character, all the real love and appreciation of his wife, ordinarily overlaid by his egotism, came out in full force, and the staunchest stickler for domestic feality could not have demanded greater solicitude than the frightened husband exhibited.

In a wonderfully short space of time the house assumed the appearance which illness always gives. The servants went about their work whispering, and the sitting-rooms were silent and deserted. No one bestowed a thought on Clare. The attendants on the suffering woman, busily engaged in carrying out the orders given them by Dr. Munns, who remained for several hours with his patient—the alarmed husband, who wandered about disconsolately between his own library and his wife's room—all forgot the girl's existence. It was very late—within a few minutes of the usual dinner-hour—an inflexible period at Poynings—when Clare Carruthers crossed the flower-garden, entered the house by the window, through which she had left it, and stole gently up stairs to her own room. She threw her hat and shawl upon her bed, and went to her dressing-table. There she stood for some minutes before the glass, holding her disordered hair back with her hands—there were bits of grass and fragments of leaves in it, as though she had been lying with her fair head prone upon the ground—and gazing upon her young misery-stricken face. White about the full pure lips, where the rich blood ordinarily glowed, purple about the long fair eyelids and the blushing cheeks, heavy-eyed, the girl was piteous to see, and she knew it. The hours that had passed over since she left her uncle's presence in the morning had been laden with horror, with dread, with such anguish as had never in its lightest form touched her young spirit before, and she trembled as she marked the ravages they had made in her face.

"What shall I do?" she murmured, as though questioning her own forlorn image in the glass. "What shall I do? I dare not stay away from dinner, and what will they say when they see my face?"

She fastened up her hair, and bathed her face with cold water, then returned to the glass to look at it again; but the pallor was still upon the lips, the discoloration was still about the heavy eyelids. As she stood despairingly before the dressing-table, her maid came to her.

"The dinner-bell will not ring, ma'am," said the girl. "Mr. Carruthers is afraid of the noise for Mrs. Carruthers."

"Ay," said Clare, listlessly, still looking at the disfigured image in the glass. "How is she?"

"No better, ma'am; very bad indeed, I believe. But don't take on so, Miss Clare," her maid went on, affectionately. "She is not so bad as they say, perhaps; and, at all events, you'll use yourself up and be no comfort to Mr. Carruthers."

A light flashed upon Clare. She had only to keep silence, and no one would find her out; her tears, her anguish, would be imputed to her share of the family trouble. Her maid, who would naturally have noticed her appearance immediately, expressed no surprise. Mrs. Carruthers was very ill, then. Something new had occurred since the morning, when there had been no hint of anything serious in her indisposition. The maid evidently believed her mistress acquainted with all that had occurred. She had only to keep quiet, and nothing would betray her ignorance. So she allowed the girl to talk, while she made some trifling change in her dress, and soon learned all the particulars of Mrs. Carruther's illness, and the doctor's visit, of her uncle's alarm, and Mrs. Brookes' devoted attendance on her mistress. Then Clare, trembling, though relieved of her immediate apprehension of discovery, went down stairs to join her uncle at their dreary dinner. He made no comment upon the girl's appearance, and, indeed, hardly spoke. The few words of sympathy which Clare ventured to say were briefly answered, and as soon as possible he left the dining-room. Clare sat by the table for a while, with her face buried in her hands, thinking, suffering, but not weeping. She had no more tears to-day to shed.

Presently she went to Mrs. Carruthers' room, and sat down on a chair behind the door, abstracted and silent. In the large dimly-lighted room she was hardly seen by the watchers. She saw her uncle come in, and stand forlornly by the bed, then the doctor came, and several figures moved about silently and went away, and then there was no one but Mrs. Brookes sitting still as a statue beside the sufferer, who lay in a state of stupor. How long she had been in the room before the old woman perceived her, Clare did not know, but she felt Mrs. Brookes bending over her, and taking her hand, before she knew she had moved from the bedside.

"Pray go away and lie down, Miss Carruthers," the old woman said, half tenderly, half severely. "You can do no good here, no one can do any good here yet, and you will be ill yourself. We can't do with more trouble in the house, and crying your eyes out of your head, as you've been doing, won't help any one, my dear. I will send you word how she is the first thing in the morning."

The old woman raised the girl by a gentle impulse, as she spoke, and she went meekly away, Mrs. Brookes closing the door behind her with an unspoken reflection on the uselessness of girls, who, whenever anything is the matter, can do nothing but cry.

The night gradually fell upon Poynings, the soft, sweet, early summer night. It crept into the sick-room, and overshadowed the still form upon the bed, the form whose stillness was to be succeeded by the fierce unrest, the torturing, vague effort of fever; it closed over the stern pompous master of Poynings, wakeful and sorely troubled. It darkened the pretty chamber, decorated with a thousand girlish treasures, and simple adornments, in which Clare Carruthers was striving sorely with the first fierce trial of her prosperous young life. When it was at its darkest and deepest, the girl's swollen weary eyelids closed, conquered by the irresistible mighty benefactor of the young who suffer. Then, if any eye could have pierced the darkness and looked at her, as she lay sleeping, the stamp of a great fear upon her face, even in her slumber, and her breast shaken by frequent heavy sighs, it would have been seen that one hand was hidden under the pillow, and the fair cheek pressed tightly down upon it, for better security. That hand was closed upon three letters, severally addressed to the advertising department of three of the daily newspapers. The contents, which were uniform, had cost the girl hours of anxious and agonizing thoughts. They were very simple, and were as follows, accompanied by the sum which she supposed their insertion would cost, very liberally estimated:

"The gentleman who showed a lady a sprig of myrtle on last Saturday is earnestly entreated by her not to revisit the place where he met her. He will inevitably be recognized."

"God forgive me, if I am doing wrong in this," Clare Carruthers had said with her last waking consciousness. "God forgive me, but I must save him if I can."

[To be Continued.]

A THRUST AT OUR MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES.

THE San Francisco Correspondent of the Springfield Republican, has a very indifferent opinion of the "breeding" of the head of our city government, as appears from the following in reference to their neglect to give a "reception," to Queen Emma on the occasion of her arrival here:

"Nevertheless it would have been more decent and respectful if the municipal authorities had taken some formal part in the reception, The mayor and supervisors did nothing, probably through mauvaise honte of the jokes of their constituents, or from a difference of opinion with Mr. Seward as to the respect due to a friendly power. It might have been expected that when the Secretary of State chose to extend his hospitalities to Queen Emma, the mayor of San Francisco might have accepted it as a precedent. But it was otherwise. Except the saluting of the Federal forts and war-ships and the courtesies of the collector, there was no formal reception. The municipal authorities did not go to the wharf, and the queen—a good-natured, amiable lady, whose instincts were sufficiently refined to notice the discourtesy—was received in solitary state, and conducted to her carriage and hotel by her consul, Mr. Hitchcock of San Francisco. A graceful opportunity of showing some courtesy toward a people from whom we expect so much and to whom we have done so little, a nation that must sooner or later become indentified with our own was lost, by our ridiculous policy of entrusting the conduct of a great city to the hands of underbred and underpaid nobodies.

"It is said that an occurrence as mal-adroit and boorish as this lost us the friendship of the late king, who was ejected from a car in New York on account of his color by a too sensitive Celtic conductor. Queen Emma has considerable political power by virtue of her intelligence and experience, and the court is already committed to the Oxford-Coutts-Staley-Reformed-Catholic-Church-of-England quasi political establishment at Honolulu. The Islanders are predisposed to like us and to hate the church, but they also have a superstitious love and loyalty for their king and the royal family, and it would have been at least politic, to leave courtesy out of the question, had we respected their instincts."

BREATHING.

EVERY person must breathe to live, and yet how few are aware of the full import of the act of breathing. Many seem to regard it as a mere exercise of the lungs, but even they have often no misgivings in curtailing this exercise in various ways, so as to prevent a full and regular expansion of the chest. Breathing is a twofold process. The lungs, during inspiration, take in atmospheric air as a vitality in food which mixes with the blood, and fits it for its various duties of supplying all the organs of the body with material for their growth and capacity to discharge their appropriate functions. In the second, the lungs in expiration give out another kind of air, which carries with it as its solid basis matters used, effete and no longer wanted, and the retention of which in the blood would be deleterious and before long, fatal.

These two parts of the process of breathing are always carried on together, and in assignable proportions the one to the other. There is a continual interchange of airs, or rather gasses, going on in the lungs. The oxygen of the air, the vitalizing portion, passes inwards through the fine membrane, the lungs, into the blood vessels, where it combines with the effete carbon and forms carbonic acid. This last passes outward through the pulmonary membrane, and, mixing with vapor extracted at the same time, it is given out from the lungs in expiration.

Our readers will have a better idea of the vital importance of regular and full breathing, when they learn that the material of supply, the oxygen of the atmospheric air, taken into the lungs amounts to four or five pounds in twenty-four hours, and the excreted and waste matter, carbon, the baser element of carbonic acid, amounts to between eight or nine ounces, or more than half a pound, in the twenty-four hours. It is easy to infer from these premises how the healthy must suffer from the want of pure air to supply oxygen, and of its constant renewal and movement by ventilation to carry off the deleterious carbon of the carbonic acid.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1866.

WHY HAVE WE NO SATURDAY REVIEWS?

SUCH is the dolefnl inqniry of Mr. Richard Grant White in tbe New York Galaxy, to which the Nation curtly responds, "probably because they are not wanted." There exists in London a class of weekly papers, including the Saturday Review, Spectator, London Review, and others, which are far superior in certain respects to any weeklies in the United States, where indeed no paper of the same kind has ever been attempted until qnite recently. As the Saturday Review is, upon the whole, tbe best of these pnblications, Mr. White uses its name geuerically as the type of the entire class to which it belongs.

Some of the main characteristics of the class are, that they pnblish no stories, and as a general thing no poetry and no selections, except such as may be quoted from books reviewed. Their columns are occupied by able and well considered political articles, carefully written, dispassionate and caudid in tone if not in spirit; with clever and discriminating reviews of all the more noteworthy new publications, evincing fine scbolarship and high culture; and with essays upon literary, social, philosophical, and religious subjects, which are the very perfection, at least so far as style is concerned, of this species of writing. Wide as is the range of topics, all are bandled with apparent freedom and mastery, sometimes in a vein of satire that never degenerates into coarseness, sometimes with a bumor that is never permitted to become too broad, and sometimes with a sober gravity carefully guarded against dull didacticism on the one band, or the earnestness that seems to savor of vulgar zeal on the other. The prevailing tone of these select organs of aristocratic culture is throughout quiet, self-possessed, well-bred. They know how to be incisive without flippancy, and can, when the occasion seems to demand it, deliver the most stinging insults without any conventional violation of the canons of gentility. They do not deal in sentiment, and they shrink with sensitive horror from the exhibition of anything resembling enthusiasm. The rhetoric tbey employ is polished bnt not ornate, elegant but not showy, vigorous without strain or effort, and at the farthest possible remove from the oratorical style. Add to this that their pervading spirit is calmly cynical, untouched under any circumstances by a breath of passion, or even of emotion, and that the general tenor of all their teaching seems to be that there is nothing real or valuable under the sun except material comfort, high culture, and English aristocratic institutions, and the reader is in a condition to form a tolerably definite notion of what Mr. White means when he pathetically demands, "Why have we no Saturday Reviews."

Such being the literary article, we are inclined to agree with the Nation, that it does not exist, because there is as yet no effective demand for it; and we do not anticipate that any such demand will arise until long after this generation shall have passed away. Neither do we conceive that such a class of papers would be desirable in the United States so long as our present institutions endure, or that an increasing relisb for them ought to be regarded as a promising indication. The blasé cynicism that has learned to look witb hopelessness, if not with indifference or contempt, upon every effort to improve the condition of humanity that is not directed to mere material privations is a natural growth of a civilization that has reacbed its culminating point, and has proved a failure so far as the bighest aims are concerned; but is neither natural nor wholesome in a nation still in its infancy, and with its future opening grandly before it. In the man who has gone through tbe experiences of life, and who feels that he has fulfilled his possibilities, the calm of philosophic resignation, a calm undisturbed either by ambition or passion or enthusiasm is not ungracefnl; but the same temper in the youth just setting out upon his career would be morbid, unnatural, shocking.

Saturday Reviews are the fruit of English civilization after centuries of culture. When our stage of material development shall be somewbat more advanced, we shall donbtless have Saturday Reviews of our own—with the difference that they will be American and not English. Until then, we can well afford to dispense with them.

A QUARTETTE of soldiers who had lost limbs in battle recently gave a serenade, and sang "'Tis Sweet to be Re-membered."

LITERARY TASTES.

WE think it was Doctor Johnson who observed that by a wise provision of nature confidence ordinarily keeps pace with ability, a saying in illustration of which he cites the fact that fledgling birds never manifest a disposition to leave the nest until they are in a condition to fly. The maxim may bold good so far as physical prowess is concerned, but in the field of intellectual effort, the general rule seems to be that "confidence" altogether outstrips "ability." It is not often that a man wbo cannot swim voluntarily takes a plnnge into deep water, or that an individual who has never practised the manly art, however liberally endowed witb self-esteem and "approbativeness," can be induced, if he possesses tbe average modicum of common sense, to put on the gloves with an expert. In trials of this description the tests of success are apparent and infallible, and the conscquences of failure are immediate and often disagreeable. If a man professes to be able to lift a thousand pounds, his claim can easily be decided in such a manner as to put the question beyond dispute. If Jones boasts that he can "whip" Tompkins, or outrun him, the matter can be speedily aud decisively adjudicated in a twenty-four foot ring, or on a one mile race-track. But if a man professes to be an accomplished critic, or editor, or poet, a profound philosopher or an erudite scholar—if Jones arrogates superiority over Tompkins on the score of intellectual prowess, the matter is not so easily decided—at least not in such a way as to compel the acquiescence of the worsted party. A fencer who is run through the body by his opponent, or a pugilist who fails to "come to the scratch" wben time is called, can scarcely be conceived as claiming that he has achieved a victory; but when has it ever happened in the history of intellectnal contests that the defeated party and his adherents have confessed themselves vanquished?

There are many persons, of botb sexes, as we are credibly informed, wbo consider Mr. Martin Farquhar Tupper a greater poet than Mr. Tennyson, and others who take more delight in tbe novels of T. S. Author and A. S. Roe, than in those of Charles Dickens. We have not the slightest doubt that if an admirably written article like tbat in the last Saturday Review, on "The Prosecution of Mr. Eyre," and another on the same subject, in the rhetorical style of the leaders, in a late San Francisco daily, were snbmitted to the judgments of our reading population, and a vote taken as to their respective merits, the admirers of the latter would be fonnd in a large majority. And certainly the majority who admire Mr. Tupper and Mr. Author, and wbo like to have their politics administered red hot, have a perfect right to consult their own tastes in the matter. Indeed, it is probably better that they should do so, than that they should allow themselves to be bullied by a supercilious minority into pretending that they admire what they do not appreciate, and wasting their time in reading that which does not interest or impress them. Probably the "Proverbial Philosophy" is calculated to be far more improving than Plato or Coleridge, to those who can glow with enthusiasm over the former, and would not understand the latter, just as sermons of as flimsy a texture as the popular Fourth of July oration often kindle a devotional glow in hearts that could not he toucbed by loftier and less passionate discourse.

WITHERED ROSES.

'TIS long! long! Willie darling
That parted we have been,
And many weary changes
Have chilled our hearts since then.

Through all I've ne'er forgot you—
A radiant eager face,
Oft rises up before me,
Still clad in youthful grace,

As 'twas in life's bright morning,
With sunshine all aglow,
Of Autumn never dreaming,
Nor Winter's chilling snow.

We only felt how joyous
Receiving love, to live!
And then it was thrice blessed,
A rich return to give.

Deep lines now mark your forehead,
That brow once smooth and fair—
Perchance there's silver shining,
Amid your glossy hair.

And care with phantom's fingers,
So pityless and cold,
Has strained your quivering heart-strings,
Till they are worn and old.

Oh! withered rose! poor token—
Time yellowed, o'er and o'er—
Of what I never could forget,
Were every month a year.

VOICE OF THE BELL.

UP in my belfry, hung on high,
The world beneath, above, the sky,
There, rushing from my dusky throat,
With crash and clang and rolling note,
I chime and rhyme, and ceaseless cry,
How years and months and days go by:
O, ho! O, ho! ye men below,
O, list my voices as they flow.

Up in my belfry there on high,
To all, are born, who live, who die,
I count each hour that fleeting goes.
Swift couriers of joys or woes—
That guard the gates of time and death
The coming or the passing breath:
O, ho! O, ho! all men below,
I mark each footstep as you go.

The owl and I keep holiday,
And watch and listen while you pray,
And in the starlight we look out,
When ghosts like shadows glide about,
Yet flesh is blind and may not see
These things so plain to him, or me:
O, ho! O, ho! wise men below,
I keep time's records as you go.

My voices float o'er field or fell,
Where rolling forth they rise and swell,
And time's behests they throbbing tell,
To all things on the earth that dwell,
That from my icy lips must hear,
The passing bell for all things here:
O, ho! O, ho! all men below,
Improve my voices as they go.

LOCAL ART ITEMS.

ANOTHER picture by William Keith, exhibited at Snow & Roos' during tbe past week, has elicited much praise. The view is taken from tbe vicinity of San Rafael, looking across deep valleys and beyond the bay to the distant mountains on the coast. The scene is a brilliant sunset, with a warm and pleasant color diffused over the foilage, and richly tinting the far off hills and the clouds. The atmospheric effect is very fine, particularly that of the distance, and the management of the light and shade, in the immediate foreground, excellent. There is, however, a lack of clearness and distinctness in the foilage of the foreground, which, although well drawn, would bear a little stronger treatment. The work bears evideuce of deep study, not only of general effect, but of minnte details, and shows more correct drawing, and more careful finish than are generally displayed by water colorists; it is, perhaps, less pleasing than "Tamalpais" lately exhibited by the same artist, for here, the landscape possesses no such grand feature as is seen in that picture; nevertheless, in execution, it is a decided improvement, and shows to a greater extent the power of the artist.

Nast's "March through Georgia" continues to attract. It is a painting that well repays one visit; but we cannot say tbat it improves upon acquaintance. The little exhibition-room contains, however, many other pictures of widely different degrees of merit, numbering among the artist exhibiting, the names of Babcock, Hill, Mulligan, Denny, Sommer, Wandesforde, Williams, Arriola and Young. Three of Babbock's paintings, decidedly French in style, are in the collection; the first, representing a vase of flowers, is very perfect in drawing, beautiful in design and rich in coloring; another is a portrait of a very ugly fish, but painted to the life as one may tell at a glance; and the third, is the head of a girl whose style of beauty is not at all to our liking. The gems of the whole collection are two companion pictures of cabinet size, by Otto Sommers, of New York, representing deer: in one painting, drinking at a refreshingly cool and shady stream, and in the other, standing on the hill top.

Those who delight in the terribly tragic, may find pleasure in the contemplation of a large oil painting of an attack by savages upon a party of whites; the picture bears the name of Narjot, who is a stranger to San Franciscans, and whose works are likely to be as strange and unknown unless he adopts a lighter and more pleasing class of subjects and style of painting

Duncan's auction-rooms are hung with an immense number of pictures for sale; the greater part of them evidently an importation from Germany: but in the whole collection there are scarcely six pictures possessing originality or beauty in the slightest degree.

JEM BARRETT'S MERRY CHRISTMAS.

BY "TREM."

"A MERRY Christmas!" These words, spoken so often on Tuesday, December 25th 1866, in the streets of San Francisco in "the Golden State," set us to reflecting; we thought: even in this favored land there must be many to whom this Christmas will not be "A Merry Christmas"—many to whom it will only bring thoughts of Christmases in the past time which were indeed merry and happy. We, with these thoughts in our head, became sick of the conventional salutation "A Merry Christmas," and wandered down to the almost deserted City Front. Stern, grim-faced men met, and, extending their hands towards each other, gave utterance to the words which we have before mentioned. They conformed to custom. There was no "Merry Christmas" in their faces. It was evident that to them "Merry Christmas" was a bore, inasmuch as there was no business in it.

It was noontide; the stores were closing; the vessels lying at the wharves were deserted; all hands were off duty to enjoy a Merry Christmas. The houses of the moneyed men of San Francisco were being prepared for the reception of guests; the fine silver plate was being rubbed into a condition of dazzling brilliancy by the servant girl, who had been allowed, as a special privilege, to attend midnight Mass at the Cathedral, and thus religiously inaugurate her Merry Christmas. Thousands of turkeys, to whom Merry Christmas brings a relief of all their troubles—such as a scarcity of grasshoppers, terrible frights from rattlesnakes, and other ills that turkey flesh is heir to, were frizzling, comfortably stuffed, in thousands of ovens. The very latest invitations to dinner were being delivered, the most procrastinating of parents were purchasing at the late-closing stores the toys for the Christmas trees which were to delight their offspring, when we came upon Jem Barrett. We had reached the City Front, and were reflecting on the stillness which prevailed, when we observed a dog—a melancholy dog—who was wandering in the most objectless manner on a wharf, on which were several piles of lumber. This dog appeared dejected; he seemed as if he could not realize the fact that it was Christmastide, and did not appreciate that it was incumbent on him to run about wagging his tail and appearing jolly. We pitied the dog's ignorance of times and seasons, and were about to cultivate his acquaintance with a view to making Christmas merry to him by purchasing a beef-bone from a profane butcher who had kept his store open until after noon, when a sharp whistle from the side of a pile of lumber fronting the bay, attracted his attention, and, with drooping ears—ditto, tail—and diffident gait, the dog proceeded in the direction from whence the sound came.

We wished to make it a Merry Christmas for that dog as far as it lay in our power; not that the dog was prepossessing in appearance—on the contrary, mange, or some other disease, had caused a large portion of his hair to fall off, and unseemly bare places appeared on his body. The dog disappeared behind the woodpile. Hearing a voice, and fearing lest the dog, who had gained our sympathy, might have fallen into bad hands, we walked quietly up to the woodpile fully convinced that if any cruelty were attempted to be offered, even to a dog, on Christmas Day, it was our bounden duty to punch the agressor's head, even if he were a dog poisoner, engaged by the Pound Master—or the Pound Master himself. Looking round the corner of the woodpile we saw a man of apparently about thirty years of age, lounging in a graceful attitude on the logs. He had thrown his hat down on the ground, and was running his fingers through a mass of dark brown hair, which fell in short curls over a broad, white forehead. His hands were small and beautifully formed, his eyes were of a deep, dark blue; a small moustache shaded a mouth small and as finely-shaped as that of any woman. His coat was shabby, and his hat—a "stove-pipe"—had been so much brushed that the nap was nearly worn off.

It was evident to us at a glance that this man had "breed" in him. The dog was slowly making its way up to him; half fearful to trust him; he was licking his lips, crouching in the dust, and ever and anon feebly wagging his tail with a view of conciliating his new found acquaintance. The man was looking at the dog with a lazy, pleased expression. At length he snapped his fingers exclaiming, "A Merry Christmas. Come, my boy, come along; we're good friends!"

The dog sprang forward and lay down at his feet, wagging his tail and looking up in his face confidingly. The man, then patting the dog on the head, repeated "A Merry Christmas."

The dog wagged his tail.

"Ah, that's kind, but you've never been introduced to me. My name is Jem Barrett. Oh, all right; you wag your tail—you accept my acquaintance. Shocking bad coat you have on. 'Yes,' you say, 'so is yours.' That's true, my dog, and you are better off than I am. You, perhaps, are simply troubled with a slight cutaneous disease from bad diet, which has caused you to lose your coat. When you manage to get good food for a week or so, Nature will give you a new one. Look at me. Nature won't give me a new coat. Come, I see you are a dog of good breeding, in reduced circumstances What is left of your coat shows that you once had a good one. A thoroughbred skye-terrier? Eh? You wag your tail to say 'Yes.' Born of good parents? Wag again, yes. Your father, perhaps, belonged to the Lord Nosewho, who made his footman wash and comb him every day, and your mother might have been the bosom friend and companion of the Duchess of Dougesnaps. Ah, ah! another wag of the tail for 'yes,' eh? Give me your paw. Good dog! You can give a paw. Sit up. By gad, he sits up. Here is a dog of good ancestry; his hair (what he has left of it;) his eyes and his ears show it, a dog that has been educated to sit up, to give a paw, and perhaps to fetch and carry, reduced to this lamentable condition. I wonder what his name is? I had a dog that I called "Cupid." Here Cupid! He wags his tail, Oh, he's just like a man, he'll answer to any name when you invite him to dinner. Now, Cupid, here are you, as you confess and as I know a dog of first rate breed, and as you declare, and as I partly believe, a dog of good education, nearly starved and without a dinner on Christmas Day. Wag your tail will you, you scoundrel! Well here am I Jem Barrett, late—that is twelve years ago—a promising graduate of the first college in the country; born of good parents, I can have no real Christmas Dinner. I have two bits in my pocket. Ah, you understand me, and I have paid my room-rent for a week to come, we'll go home together, I'll buy a bit's worth of beef-steak, (yes, wag your tail you scoundrel, that isn't for you)—five cent's worth of lager—(that isn't for you)—a five cent loaf, (you wouldn't eat that, you rascal, hungry as you are; you'd rather go out and hunt for a dead horse,) and five cent's worth of beef bones for you, you old shabby coated, gentlemanly, well educated dog who has seen better days, and so you and I together will spend "A Merry Christmas."

CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DWINELLE AS A DOGMATIC THEOLOGIAN.

EDITORS CALIFORNIAN:

MR. JOHN W. DWINELLE, in a recent communication to the Bulletin, elicited by a criticism on a portion of his late address before the California Pioneers, makes the following assertions, some in express terms, others by necessary implication:

1st. That Lord Rosse's telescope when turned upon the nebulæ within its reach, instantly resolved them into fixed, starry points.

2d. That it thus gave the death blow to the "Nebular theory" propounded by Laplace.

3d. That this was the reason why the author of the "Vestiges of Creation" (published anonymously,) who had advocated this theory, retained his incognito.

4th. That Laplace was an "Atheist."

5th. That he was an "avowed Atheist."

6th. That the "Nebular theory" made him an Atheist.

7th. That Atheism is a necessary logical deduction from the Nebular theory.

8th. That the government of the universe is carried on by a system of interferences which take place whenever the interposition of a Supreme Intelligence becomes necessary.

9th. "That if God never interferes with the physical or human affairs of the universe, there is no need of a God."

As these propositions are put forward with confidence by has one who repels, with some asperity, the imputation that he not studied the subject, and who aspires to the position of a scholar, it may be well to devote a little space to their examamination.

1st. It is not true that Lord Rosse's telescope proved as would be inferred from Mr. Dwinelle's language, all the visible nebulæ to consist of clusters of stars; for the more distant groups resisted its powers. It may be urged that the discoveries thus effected render it probable that all nebulæ could be equally resolvable, if telescopes of sufficient power were brought to bear upon them. See, however, Humboldt's Cosmos, vol. 4, p 307. Spencer's Essays, "Nebular Theory," where the correctness of this deduction is disputed.

2d. These discoveries did not refute the "Nebular theory" of Laplace, which was a conjecture as to the original formation of the solar system by the condensation of nebular matter and the operation of the laws of gravitation, heat and motion. The advocates of the theory would certainly have added to its strength, if they could have pointed to similar processes now in operation in the world of space. But it does not follow that a theory of the genesis of the solar system is false, because we cannot substantiate it by existing analogies. This Nebular theory, so far from being exploded, is still held by the most eminent astronomers and physicists, as Herschel, De Morgan, Tyndall, Faraday, Spencer, and others. "The two hypotheses," says Humboldt, "(the Nebular theory of the origin of the system, and that of the condensation of nebulæ into stars) are not necessarily connected." Cosmos, vol. 4, p 303, citing Sir John Herschel, who states that "they stand in fact quite independent of each other."

3d. The same reason which induced the author of the Vestiges to publish it anonymously, probably led him to preserve his incognito. Ecce Homo, is a work which has had to encounter the same kind of ordeal as the Vestiges. Would it be fair to assert as a fact, that the author withholds his name from the public on account of the manner in which the Quarterly Review exposed his fallacies? As to the ridicule which would have been showered on the author of the Vestiges, had he been known, he could have well afforded to bear it, with a Humboldt, Herschel, Tyndall, Arago and Lardner to keep him company.

4th. De Morgan and Nichol severally assert that Laplace has expressed no Atheistical views. He was a man of science, not a theologian. He dealt with the laws of matter and did not speculate on final causes. Perhaps he was an Atheist, but as he has made no such declaration, it is rather harsh to fasten this imposition upon him.

5th. The assertion that he was an avowed Atheist is believed to be destitute of any authority. In "Laplace" in Cye. Univ. Biog., also in Knight's Cyclop., also article "Solar System," in latter.

6th. What authority is there for the assertion that the Nebular theory made Laplace an Atheist? Does Mr. Dwinelle mean that every advocate of this theory is an Atheist?

7th. It is surprising that Mr. Dwinelle should suppose that the adoption of the Nebular theory nullifies the Creator and leaves no room for the exercise of his agency. Why is it Atheistical to suppose that earth, sun and planets were once light bodies of nebulous matter, which in the course of ages have condensed to their present specific gravity? Since the eocene period, our earth has undergone enormous changes—changes of temperature—of proportions of land and water—of animal and vegetable life.—Why, then, is it Atheistical to suppose that untold centuries earlier than this period, this earth was in a still more rude, undeveloped and embryonic state? And if the earth, why not the sun and planets? Progressive development seems to be the love of all things here below; why should it not extend throughout creation? If a tree passes through various changes from germination to decay, why not a world also?

As to this theory, it was put forward with great diffidence simply as a hypothesis. Its philosophical merit is that it explains how, in accordance with known laws, the solar system might possibly have attained its present condition. Kepler thought the planets were kept in their places by presiding spirits. This theory disappeared when the law of gravitation was discovered, but as the theory of gravitation throws back one step the immediate agency of the Creator, which is all that the nebular theory does, the one seems just as atheistical as the other.

8th. Conceding the universe to be governed by an all-wise, all-powerful and perfect Being, it is difficult, without inconsistency, to suppose him interfering with the work of his hands. The class of thinkers to whom Mr. Dwinelle seems so bitterly opposed, regard every event as the result of established laws, and do not concede the doctrine of special divine interferences with an order of things foreknown and sanctioned by the Supreme Intelligence.

9th. If the divine government is not constant in its operation, but consists of a system of interferences with physical or human affairs, what become of these affairs during the intervals of non-interference? A human artificer interferes with his handiwork to correct some defect, to remedy some unforeseen difficulty, to effect some change in the modus operandi. The necessity of interference argues some imperfection or defect in the machinery, or the occurrence of some unexpected emergency which it is not adequate to overcome. But suppose an all-wise, all powerful artificer "in whom is no viriableness, neither shadow of turning," and what place is there for the hypothesis of interference? As to Mr. Dwinelle's idea that if the universe is not governed as he conceives it to be, there is no need of a God, we simply pass it by in "expressive silence."

Charles Lamb, in one of his letters to Southey, who had been assailing Leigh Hunt on the score of his assumed religious belief, remarks of one of Southey's arguments, as follows: "This is such a piece of theological hardihood as, I think, warrants me in concluding that when you sit down to pen theology, you do not at all consider your opponents; but have in your eye, merely and exclusively, readers of the same way of thinking as yourself, and therefore have no occasion to trouble yourself with the quality of the logic to which you treat them." ACKNOWLEDGMENT.—A handsome stereoscope, with sets of California views, from Lawrence & Houseworths, was placed on our table on Christmas. Nothing could be fitter for a present to friends at the East, or more valued than these stereoscopic views of the magnificient scenery of California.

FULLER & MCCARTHY'S fourth reunion of their pupils, on Thursday evening last, was a happy festival for the juvenile votaries Trepsichore.

THE earth turns upon its axis, making one revolution every twenty-four hours, except in Mexico—there they have a revolution two or three times a day.

THAT EVENT AT SIR WALTER'S.

A FRIGHTFUL BUT VERY FASHIONABLE INCIDENT.

"WE were staying at Sir Walter de Courcy's, when it happened," she said. "Do you know Sir Walter? Charming person; a most distinguished person; a person whom if you met in the street, you could turn round and say to yourself, "that is certainly a person of consequence. He was made a baronet, I believe, by Edward the Black Prince; that is to say, at least, there was a baronetcy in the family so early as the battle of Crecy—well, if there were no such title, it may have been a knighthood—indeed it must have been; but odd it must have seemed (one can scarcely fancy it!) to have been entirely without baronets. He lives at Doon Hall, you know, in Suffolk; a most charming spot; quite an ancestral spot as it were; deer and fern, and park and glade, and armorial bearings in stone all over the front door. We went there in the late September. Do you sketch? Only photograph? Ah! you might have made a beautiful picture of that harvest moon shining upon those magnificent monarchs of the forest—I mean the oaks, of course—and also upon the elms. There was a very large party at the hall, besides ourselves, composed entirely of the first people of the county; and there were several great people from London, in addition to distinguished foreigners, and so on, whom one has read of in the Morning Post. There was the Count de Milletonneres, for instance; you remember the scandal about him and the Queen of Castile, but that was the Prince Donnerblitzen, by the by; well, he was at Doon likewise, and in fact there was almost everybody there worth knowing. Only, such figures as those unhappy foreigners did make of themselves when they went out cover-shooting! The Prince shot an exceedingly ugly owl in mistake for a hen pheasant, one day: with those immense silk nets over their game bags, it looked, as Lionel said, a good deal more like fishing than shooting—I mean Mr. Lionel de Courcy, Sir Walter's eldest son. He was the life and soul of the party, and the best waltzer, to my mind, that ever I danced with. Some people object, immensely, to the smell of tobacco, but really it is so general, that there must be something to be said on the other side of the question; and then, of course, he always smoked the very best. How he could ever have got himself engaged (indeed some do say that it isn't an engagement, but only that he wants to make it appear so) to that perky, little, supercilious, dowdy-looking (but there, I daresay she's a friend of yours, and I know nothing absolutely against her) Miss Emmeline Cecil, with her hundred thousand pounds, or something very nearly as dreadful of that sort. Well, with such a numerous party in the house, you may well imagine that the days passed pleasantly enough, and the evenings—when the men had done with their shooting stories, and there was dancing in the great hall, and a little champagne supper always afterwards—were certainly especially delightful. Positively, the house was so full, that, huge as it was, and dull and mysterious, and with the reputation of course of being haunted, I never once so much as dreamt of being afraid at night: to be sure, I slept with Eleanor Howard, who is as bold as a lion, and fears nothing in the world or out of it, with the exception of a black beetle, which, as you must have heard, has been the failing of her family ever since the Conquest, and one which they are excessively proud of—and we two used to sit up until the small hours with the Maitland girls, who occupied the next room. We had just parted from them at about two o'clock on a certain morning, and were about to open our own door, when who should we see coming out of Sir Walter's own room, at the end of the corridor, but a real, live burglar. He had a black mask on and a dark lantern, and he looked terrible beyond description, as you may believe. We rushed inside, and turned our key like lightning, so that I was on the sofa in hysterics, and Eleanor screaming murder through the keyhole at the pitch of her voice, within a half-minute; but though we roused the house by these methods almost immediately, our burglar had yet time to get out of sight. Of his presence there was, luckily for our reputation as witnesses, no possibility of a doubt, for the ladder by which he came still leant against Sir Walter's dressing-room window, and the marks of the intruder's soppy footprints—for it was a wet night out of doors—were plainly visible upon the carpets. Never shall I forget the scene of confusion which ensued. Prince Donnerblitzen came forth from his apartment in a silver-spangled dressing-gown, with the poker in his hand. The Count de Milletonneres—who came last, by the by, not having been able, in his valet's absence, and in the dark, to tie his neckcloth to his mind—appeared with a drawn couteau de chasse and in full costume and something over. He had forgotten to take his yellow silk night-cap off, and it was not becoming. Lionel, who, I am sorry to say, was sitting up in the smoking-room when the alarm was given, had a cigar in his mouth.

"Lord Senex, poor gentleman, would not have looked more than twenty years worse than he did the preceding evening, in spite of his having omitted to put on his wig, had he not left his teeth behind him. Nor were the ladies at all better prepared for general inspection than the other sex. Eleanor and myself being, by reason of our late hours, the only fortunate exceptions. The Maitland girls, indeed, might have appeared less dishevelled if they had chosen to do so; but they were charmed with the opportunity thus afforded them of letting their back-hair down, and showing all the world how long it was, an advantage they did not neglect. As for our friend Miss Emmeline Cecil, I confess that her appearance gave me some malicious pleasure on account of the reason which she gave us for that profusion of natural curls. 'It will curl,' she used to say, 'although I would give anything to wear it plain, like other people.' She was most accurately attired and perfectly self-possessed (the little wretch!) and beamed on her preserver, as she called him, Mr. Lionel, as bewitchingly as ever, except that she had omitted to remove her curl-papers. I really felt for her when she would first look in the glass and find it out. I confess, however, I could at first think of nothing but the burglar, and of the murder, that it was more than possible might yet be done. The gentlemen were dispersed whooping and hallooing all over the house, save one who kept watch in Sir Walter's dressing-room, lest the villain should endeavor to make his exit by that way. We ladies were all huddled together on the centre landing of the great staircase, where there is a large bay-window, used, they say, a good deal, for flirting upon ball-nights. I don't know the place myself, but with its couple of orange trees and conversation-chair, and heavy blue satin curtains upon either side, it looks, I must say, charming enough from the outside.

"Some of our party there assembled had doubtless very pleasant memories connected with this bower; but they were too much terrified to entertain them at such a time. What was going on elsewhere in the house was like some very horrible game at hide and seek, with the addition that the person who was to jump out upon the seekers (in the very terrifying manner peculiar to that game) would probably have a loaded pistol in one hand and a loaded stick in the other. As doors opened and shut the noise of the search increased or diminished, but we could almost always hear something of it in a—'There he is, Prince; give it him with the poker,' from Mr. Lionel, who enjoyed the hunt amazingly; or in the more serious—'Come out, you ruffian, or I'll shoot you like a dog,' from Sir Walter, when he imagined that the object of his pursuit was harboring in this or that dark corner. Once we heard a gun go off, and then a tremendous trampling of feet, which made us all cling to one another in terror; but the Count de Milletonneres appeared immediately afterwards to calm our fears by explaining that the weapon had gone off by accident.

"'We are now,' he added, 'about to search the cellars, ladies, and then—unless from an overstrained philanthropy you are yourselves concealing this gentleman—we shall not know where to look for him.'

"A little more opening and shutting of doors, a few calls for candles, a smothered voice or two from underneath the Hall itself, and then—silence. We were now left entirely unprotected, and out of the reach of masculine aid.

"'Gracious goodness!' cried Miss Emmeline, 'only think if the gentlemen should have looked over him somewhere, and he were to come out upon us now!'

"This was precisely the idea which we were each of us endeavoring to banish from our minds, and which, expression having been thus given to it, repossessed us with redoubled strength. I do not suppose that thirteen women ever passed such a quarter of an hour in company before. There was not a single word spoken by any of us till the gentlemen re-appeared. The search was then given up as utterly fruitless, and we retired to our respective rooms just as it was about getting daylight.

"The worst part of this terrible story remains behind. When the housemaids went about their work the next morning, they found in that bay window upon the stairs, and within one of those curtains in front of the flirting-place, the list-slippers which the burglar had worn over his hob-nailed shoes; the prints of which were visible under the window he had escaped by.

"The robber had been standing—in the blue satin curtain—in the very centre of us during all those weary hours. He had listened to our conversation, and been the subject of it—the receptacle of our fears and our re-assurances. Nay, it is more than probable that we had leant against him confidentially, under the very false impression that he was only a curtain peg. Certainly no individual of his position in the social scale was ever in the intimate and domestic society of so many ladies of fashion before. Miss Emmeline, in particular, had made no stranger of him; but, as I have observed, had even exhibited her luxuriant tresses en papillote.

"The Count de Milletonneres persists in stating that we purposely concealed this unhappy wretch from his pursuers."

THE NAVIGATION OF THE AMAZON.—The Amazon river, with its many tributaries, extending for thousands of miles through South America, offers a fine field for navigation. Nine steamboats, it is said, now make up the steam mercantile marine of the Valley of the Amazon, together with some smaller vessels on the upper waters. These are owned by a company that formerly had the monopoly of the navigation of the great river, but now it is open to the competition of the whole world.

THE LECTURES OF PROFESSOR AGASSIZ.

A BOSTON correspondent writes: "Have I room left to tell of Agassiz's lectures before the Lowell Institute? Though the subject be icebergs and glaciers, and the cogitations most erudite, abstract, and minute, Professor Agassiz is a more fascinating speaker than Ristori; he makes you more appreciate and love those numb lumps of ice which float down from the pole, than Ristori makes you love the greatest and fieriest woman's heart of history—heart whose rage subdued kings and planted religions, and whose benign warmth fostered the genius of Shakspeare, Bacon, and Sidney, till they shone and shall shine as beacon lights for all the ages.

"Professor Agassiz proposes, in a course of twelve or fourteen lectures, to sketch the results of his late Brazilian tour; but in the one to which I listened on Friday, the fourth of the course, he strayed off upon his glacial theory, till he found himself floating upon an ice-raft up the Connecticut river valley, in pre-Adamite times. It is refreshing to see how the professor believes in his glaciers; he dandles and praises them, as a mother will dandle and praise her only child. He says, pityingly, that some persons conceive the only office of glaciers has been to deposit boulders upon the land. He does not understand the dullness of such as fail to discern that the world was battered into shape and rendered habitable by glaciers. His first chapter of Genesis reads: "In the beginning, God created—a glacier; and glaciers divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above; and glaciers caused the waters which were under the heavens to be gathered together unto one place, and made the dry land appear—and it was so—on and on, till Adam and Eve and the serpent floated into Eden on a glacier, and thus a glacier brought sin into the world, and all our woe.'

"But, raillery apart, there is in the speech of Agassiz, besides its warmth, a sincerity, simplicity and clearness, which not only enchain the attention, but convert the reason. One might listen to him as a study for style. Unconsciously he takes us to the fountain-head of eloquence. We may close Blair, and leave our 'Spectator' on the shelf; for lo,

> "The crystal clearness of an eye kept single;
> Shames all the frauds (arts) of man."

"What a contrast between his direct, crisp sentences, which in three lines present a theory, and the hazy, bewildering, and bewildered, diluted and re-diluted chapters of such writers as the 'Country Parson.' Agassiz will write the whole theory of the creation upon your thumb nail; the parson takes twenty pages of the Atlantic to tell how on such a day of the week, month, and year, upon such a figure of the carpet, under such a constellation of the heavens, his dog—or, as the ancients might say, Canus—proof of this being found in manuscript 127, page 16, in the Bodleian library—his dog rose up and shook himself. Let us choose, let us choose!

"I must leave for another letter to tell of the ice-raft, and how you of the Connecticut river valley were warmed into life by a glacier."

MEN OF ABILITY.

THE reasoner is the man of talent, who accumulates facts, investigates their relation, decides upon their value, and employs them as materials from which to deduce and apply theories. His liability to error arises from his want of faith in everything which is not logically proved. The man of genius, feeling by impulse or instinct that certain things are true, may commit the error of reasoning backwards, and insist that other and different facts must necessarily be in immediate relation with the particular law of the truth of which he is convinced. He may be led to contemn the slower process of induction, and is naturally led to depend more upon his impulses than his reason, and to insist that the emotions he experiences, the ideal perceptions he enjoys, shall be the law of universal life.

The man of genius is the poet and the artist, the discoverer, the philosopher at his highest. He believes in the possibility of yet greater things than have ever yet been accomplished. He gives his life to the effort to realize ideas, instinctively feeling that the ideas are in unison with established laws. When they are realized, we know so too, and that the impulses, the instincts of genius were prophetic. The poet of genius does not invent beauty in outward things, but he discovers a quality which has always existed, and he also discovers a melodious form of words, which once discovered, we all acknowledge to be in exact harmony with the beauty itself. There is a law of beauty, depend upon it; and the pleasures of the eyes and the imagination are in exact harmony with the words which the true poet selects. The man of genius has quicker perceptions, and acts as interpreter of partially-veiled truths.

That genius should be Bohemian, as the phrase goes, is assuredly a paradox. Genius is rightly a crown of glory to those who are possessed of it, not a license for degradation. The possession of genius is trust indeed, involving the responsibility of instruction in the highest matters, of "teaching the nations how to live." Whether the gift be to indite the mighty line, to wake the strain which comes upon the ear like the sweet south breeze, to reconcile the contradictions, and supplement the researches of philosophy, or to lead the despouding and doubtful to "fresh fields and pastures new," the man of genius should be conscious of his high calling as a teacher of high laws, and remember that the cloud-capped mountain which rears its head nearest to the sun, has a base upon the earth broad and firm, proportioned to its height.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

BASE BALL.—SOME TIMELY SUGGESTIONS.

BY THE FAT CONTRIBUTOR.

The base ball epidemic is raging fearfully all over the country. While cities have it the worst, not a villiage, settlement or "corners," has escaped the infection. For years "one-old-cat" and "two-old-cat" have held their place among boys at school, but bat and ball passed away with school-boy days, until recently, when base ball has suddenly been discovered to be one of the most healthful exercises, as well as the choicest amusement, extant. Weak young men, who were hardly adequate to walk aroand a billiard table during one game, a short time ago, now chase the flying ball "a-field" like wild Indians, or bat it with a vigor and precision that would knock down an ox. They are indifferent to broken fingers, callous to blistered hands, and will risk having their heads knocked off their shoulders, so enthusiastic are they in their new-found recreation.

Matches are being played between rival clubs all over the country, frequently excitiug great interest. It will die out like all spasmodic efforts of the sort, and then what next? Supposing "Blind Man's Buff" should be the next game that is resuscitated aud made to be the rage. Then we should have clubs starting up all over the country for the encouragement and cultivation of that noble and invigorating game. We should have the "Buckeye Blind Man's Buff Club," and the "Excelsior Blind Man's Buff Club." and many other variously entitled Clubs of Blind Buffers.

It would be found to be excellent for the eyes, and hardening as to the shin, besides developing to the greatest possible degree the sense of touch. A field could be prepared for the accommodation of the players, with artificial ditches, skillfully arranged for the Blind Buffer to fall into, and artificial fences for him to tumble over, in chasing the Buffers who are not blinded. It can be seen at a glance (by everybody except the blindfolded Buffer. who isn't supposed to see anything), that in this game, amusement could be blended with healthful and invigorating exercise to a greater degree than in any other game now known. While the blind Buffer is strengthening his muscles by tumbling into ditches, and developing activity by climbing out again, the other Buffers and the spectators will be kept in a constant roar of laughter, which the best medical authority declares to be most conducive to health.

There is another advantage in "Blind Man's Buff," the ladies, bless their dear little hearts, could participate in it. The objections that they have to Base Ball and Cricket couldn't be urged against Blind Man's Buff. There would be a delicious gratification (Oh! so feminine) in blinding the eyes of their male friends. Then, of course, pretending to be blinded themselves, there would be a little corner of a mischievous eye peering under the handkerchief, just enough to prevent them falling over obstructions, you know, if the attentive and watchful masculine arm did not, and contrive to be caught by just the right one. Of course the kissing that follows the act of catching or being caught, which juveniles practice, would have to be dispensed with in this case—that is postponed.

The play of the "Miller" might be added to our out-door amusements. It is simple enough, and can be played by both sexes. The miller stands in the center of a circle formed by taking hold of hands, and as the players "swing round the circle," they sing:

Happy is the miller that tends to the mill,
The mill goes round, and he gathers what he will—
A hand on the hopper, and a hand on the bag,
The mill goes round and he cries out—GRAB!

At the word "grab" the gay and festive miller makes a dart and captures a timid maiden, who has been swinging around the circle, innocently trolling her simple air, and leads her, all blushes and resistance, to the center, when he salutes her (the blast of trumpets, the clash of cymbals, and the rattle of drums, might be well introduced at this point) and retires to the ring, leaving her, the sweet little "miller-ess" with a hand in the hopper, etc., who is entitled to the next "grab."

Both sexes could participate in the above game and enjoy it greatly. It is not as developing to the muscle, perhaps, as base ball, but the exercise of singing in the open air would be advantageous to the lungs.

There are other games that might be introduced, Give "Hi spi" a chance, and "Gool" and "tag," each of which abounds in invigorating exercise and fun, and is capable of being brought to a high degree of scientific perfection.—Cincinnati Times.

A FAST STORY.

AN ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at bis side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in Eogland. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down bis companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innoceotly inquired the Yankee.

"We are approacbing a town," said tbe Englishman; "they have to commence riuging about ten miles before they get to a station, or else tho train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I soppose they hnven't iuvented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead ol the sound. the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-grown head of hair and teeth in their mooths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', al-o, Mechanical Toys, that run by tbemselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"Indeed! is that so? Who is the firm that have tbe Dolls saying 'Mamma'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasiog? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

Josh Billings on Owls.—Josh Billings says of owls: Burds is God's choristers. Tew the lion he gave majesty, tew the elephant strength, tew the fox cunning, and tew the tiger deceit. But to the burds, his pets, he gave buty and song. The owl is a game burd; he can whip anything that wears feathers—after dark. He is a wise burd, a cross between a Justice of the Peace and County Supervisor. He is a stiff burd, and sits up as stiff as a exclamation. He is a luxurious burd, and feeds on spring chickens. He is a long-lived burd, and never was nown to take death natrally. He is a hardy burd and groze tuff by bileing. He is a honest burd, and always shows an open countenance. He is a prompt burd, and satisfize at onst his outstanding bill. He is a comfortable burd, and alwaz sleeps in feathers. He is an attentive burd, and during the day can alwaze be found in. He is a festive burd, and don't come home till morning. Thus the owl is a mistaken emblem of solitude and sadness; if we dig into his natur closely, he is emphatically one of the boys, and belongs to the club.

Yankee Courtship.—One evening as I was sitting by Hetty, and had worked myself up to the point of popping the question, sez I:

"Hetty, if a fellow was to ask you to marry him what would you say?"

"That would depend on who asked me."

Then sez I, "Suppose it was Ned Willis?"

Sez she: "I'd tell Ned Willis, but not you."

That kinder staggered me, but I was too cute to lose the opportunity, and so sez I, agen:

"Suppose it was me?"

And then you ought to see her pout up her lip, and sez she:

"I don't take no supposes."

Well, now, you see, there was nothing for me to do but to touch the trigger and let the gun go off. So bang it went. Sez I:

"Lor, Hetty it's me. Won't you say yes?"

And then there was such a hallabaloo in my head I don't know zactly what tuk place, but I thought I heard a "Yes" whispered somewhere out of the skrimmage.

Theresa Sick.—Theresa is sick—Theresa, the great singing woman, alto in voice, broad in song, broadissimo in illustrative gesture. Some of the little chroniclers have entitled her the "Patti of the multitude," and charitable French appreciation finds the title witty. It surely is not specially apt. This quaintly howling creature has been for two winters the applauded vocalist of high fashionable saloons of Paris, and has been honored with appropriation and gift jewelry from Napoleon. It is a sad topic of general town-talk that this prima beldame of the Alcszar must keep silent for a month, and go southword for the healing of her brazen throat.

London is troubled to obtain a supply of pure water. The water-level in the wells is constantly sinking. The Thames water is very impure. Eminent engineers think it is settled that artesian-wells cannot be relied on to furnish a supply. Mr. Bateman, who has had large experience in hydraulic engineering, proposes as the best plan that water should be brought from the headwaters of the Severn, in the mountain ranges of Cader Idris and Plynlimmon in North Wales. He would collect the waters into lakes, one of which would be larger than Loch Katrine. The entire length of the aqueduct would be 183 miles.

Married Life.—Do not run much from home; one's own hearth is of more worth than gold. Many a marriage begins like a rosy morning, and then falls away like a snow-wreath. And why? Because the married pair neglect to be as well-pleasing to each other after marriage as before. Endeavor always to please one another. Consider what the word "wife" expresses. The married woman is the husband's domestic faith. His honor and his home are under her keeping—his well-being in her hand. Think of this!

To remove stains from the character.—Get rich.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND

IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

OF THE THOUSANDS OF COMPOUNDS BEFORE the public, "RING'S VEGETABLE AMBROSIA" for the Hair, alone, does just what it promises.

Hon. Warren Chase, the Spiritualist Lecturer, says:

"My hair and whiskers have been many years gray. RING'S VEGETABLE AMBROSIA has restored both to their original color, black, and covered the baldness on the top of my head with a fine growth of black hair. I have several friends who have used it with the same results, and I cordially recommend it as one of the few medicines that will do what its labels and circulars claim for it. WARREN CHASE."

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.

THE TELEGRAPH—AS A PRACTICAL JOKER.

A GENTLEMAN telegraphed to Philadelphia for Webster's Dictionary. His correspondent replied: "Why do you wish Webster's Unabridged, when Worcester is preferred?" etc., The operator at the Harrisburg rail road office received it. "Why do you wish Webster on a bridge?" etc.,

Original—"Betty Willistein died this morning; funeral to-morrow."

Bulled—"Betty Waller will be down this morning; furnish conveyance."

A gentleman at St. Louis wishing to intercept the steamer at Memphis on her way down, telegraphed as follows: "To John Gillespie, Clerk of the Western World, Memphis." etc., Jack received it: "John Gilles, pie clerk." etc., It was delivered on board, but the captain asserted he had no official in charge of the pies; so a message went back: "G. B. A., to John Gilles, pie clerk."

Here is one to show that not all the humors of the telegrapb arise from the telegraphers themselves; A gentleman sent the following from Kingston. N. Y., the eastern terminus of the Deleware and Hudson Canal Company, to Honesdale, Pa.: "To J. W. B. Honesdale: Your horse died this morning after writing you a letter. SIG."

The following dialogue was recently overheard passing over a newly-opened line,

Plug in the rural districts to operator at head office (loq)—"Please don't bear so hard on your key when you send to me."

Operator—"Why not?"

Plug—"Because it tears the paper on my machine when it marks!"

The recipient of the astounding scientific reply hasn't ventured to work on that circiut since.

In the summer of 1864, a telegraphic order was sent to Washington by Gen. McCallum. Superintendant of Military Railroads, to Major Wantz, at Binghampton, New York, to forward one hundred and fifty railroad men to Washington at once.

The despatch, when it reached its destination, read "1,500 men." Such a demand was considered extraordinary, but in those days of "military necessity" strange things were always expected, and the men were soon collected, and on their way South, wondering into what part of Dixie they were to clear a way for Uncle Sam's iron horses. But the surprise of the Superintendant was still greater when they arrived, and a search was immediately instituted for the operator who made the mistake.

As it cost about $13,000 to transport the men to Washington, and the expense of keeping them there was not less than $2.000 per day, it seemed likely to prove a serious affair to somebody. It was ascertained that the mistake occurred in transmission between New York and Binghampton, but before the investigation was concluded, an order came from Gen. Sherman, then at Dalton, Georgia, to send bim one thousand railroad men immediately, and so the blunder resulted in good to the Government, and the telegraph was saved from censure.

A telegram was handed in at one of the western New York offices. for transmission not long ago, which read as follows: "Own to the whether the vig is split."

The writer was the captain of a lake steamer engaged for an excursion trip, and his message, on being carefully considered, was found to mean, "Owing to the weather, the voyage is spoiled."

Also, another dispatch, written by a German, which read, "I have re sufft puttger and gack." which we found should be, "I have received picture and check."

Another operator received the following dispatch last winter: "Don't send oysters till turkey," which should have read, "Tuesday" instead of "Turkey."

About two years ago, a "night owl" received the signature of a California message which he was repeating, as "The ordor of roses." The next morning we found his copy and had the message repeated, giving the signature: "Theodore Rose."

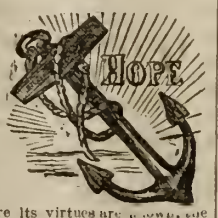
AYER'S
CHERRY PECTORAL,
FOR THE RAPID CURE OF
COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA, HOARSENESS, CROUP, BRONCHITIS, INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION, AND FOR THE RELIEF OF CONSUMPTIVE PATIENTS IN ADVANCED STAGES OF THE DISEASE.



SO wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous are the cases of its cures, that almost every section of country abounds in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other Expectorant is too apparent to escape observation and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs that are incident to our climate. While many inferior remedies thrust upon the community have failed and been discarded, this having gained friends by every trial, conferred benefits on the afflicted they can never forget, and produced cures too numerous and too remarkable to be forgotten.
We can only assure the public, that its quality is carefully kept up to the best it ever has been, and that it may be relied on to do for their relief all that it has ever done.
Great numbers of clergymen, Physicians, Statesmen, and eminent personages, have lent their names to certify the unparalleled usefulness of our remedies, but space here will not permit the insertion of them. The Aeents below named furnish gratis our AYERICAN ALMANAC in which they are given; with also full descriptions of the complaints they cure.

JUDGE.—(Reads) Swinney vs. Smith.—G. F. & W. H. Shop, and J. W Winer for Piffs., and L. Delos and H. E. Hightone for Defts.

WINER.—Ready, your Honor.

HIGHTONE.—We ask for a continuance, if the Court please, for this reason—one of our most impor—

WINER.—We object stremously to a continuance, if the Court please. If your Honor could scan the mighty and exhaustive preparations we have made for this, the most important controversy of any age, resembling only in extent and scale the marshalling of the gorgeous legions of the Ottoman Porte as he marches under the banner of the crescent with stupendous grandeur from the gates of Istamboul, your Honor would hesitate before—

JUDGE.—One moment, sir.

WINER.— ——would hesitate—

JUDGE.—Sit down, sir; the Court is speaking. This Court sir, I would have the member of the bar understand, never hesitates. Responsibilities are evaded by some tribunals—some retire their opinions before the criticism—always unjust—of the Press—but this Court, never. Proceed, Mr. Winer

HIGHTONE.—But your Honor we have an affid—

JUDGE.—One moment, sir. I desire it to be understood that when the mind of the Court is being instructed by the suggestions of a member of this bar that any attempt to interrupt the abalienation of thought from the mind of the latter to the intellect of the former, is at variance with all the conventions of professional decorum. Proceed, Mr. Winer, the Court will see that the current of your thought is not again intercepted.

WINER.—Preparations on so magnificent a scale could not be made without the expenditure of fabulous treasure. Like Cleopatra, we have dissolved the magnificent treasures of a princely client in the organization of our case, and have to-day entered this tribunal—more illustrious than the historic forum of the eternal city—to seek for justice from our ignoble adversary. As well ask Olympian Jove to stay the flight of Mercury leaping forth, full fledged, from out his brain, as to seek through the aid of principles of law to delay the examination of this case. We stand here to-day engirdled with more than all the glorious privileges of the ancient, as in super-eminent grandeur and pride, he said, "I am a Roman." We call for justice, without which the most illustrious of earth's titled regality is less than nothing—with which the most indigent and lowly of her myriad sons is elevated to the pinnacle of equality with the empurpled, ermined monarch on his gemmed and jeweled throne of royal state. Better for our client that he cast himself before the mighty Juggernaut of the benighted Hindoo and be crushed to death, than to have this continuance granted in the face of our more than regal expenditure, of months of wearied professional, Herculean labor, the fretting of the brain, and the exhaustion of the physical man.

G. F. SHOP.—In addition to what Mr Winer has said for its object being to prevent the continuance I cannot see what is the object. The point of this thing is that they seek, that is, for the purpose of delaying us in going to trial and we contend that it cannot be done. Your Honor remembers that in the case of Jay vs. Doe what your Honor said was that our object was to procure the evidence in order so that the other side could not prevent the delay. I say that's conclusive; they can't go behind that.

L. DELOS.—This matter cannot be determined by authorities from Cleopatra or the Ottoman Porte, however applicable they might be as illustrations in an oration before an agricultural fair in the interior. The case of Jones vs. Towne is conclusive on this subject, and ought to end all discussion. If my colleague here was not a young man I should have no fear of the result of this application, but young men never know anything and are so presumptuous withal that they imperil every case they have anything to do with. Young men never ought to be lawyers. I never studied law till I was forty and I suppose I am to-day the first lawyer in the State without any exception.

JUDGE.—The Court grasps this subject completely. The relation of the parties to this suit is very simple and there is only one question I desire discussed. Suppose, Mr. Delos, that an application for a continuance is made based on an affidavit containing all the requisites called for by the legislative department of the Government except one and that the defect so existing is a conclusive reason why the Court ought not to grant the continuance. Suppose, too, that that reason is not urged by counsel opposing the motion but that their opposition is placed on other untenable grounds, should the Court accede to the motion or deny it upon the ground that the affidavit is defective in its structure?

L. DELOS.—I came here, if the court please, to argue this motion—not to answer legal conundrums, and I insist—

JUDGE.—Mr. Delos, the language you have just used is offensive to the Court, and—

L. DELOS.—But your Honor, I—

JUDGE.—Silence, sir. In the judicial department of our Government, under the Constitution, nothing is so essential to the due administration of justice as a complete deference and submission to the will of the Court. To permit language to be used such as that just uttered in the presence of the Court, is destructive of the very foundation of our entire judicial system. Mr. Sheriff commit Mr. Delos to the County jail for one month.

L. DELOS.—This is the first time—

JUDGE.—Silence, sir, don't you hear me? Mr. Clerk enter a fine of one thousand dollars against Mr. Delos, and strike his name from the roll. Attorneys must understand that this Court does not handy words. The language of the fishmarket is inappropriate to this Court, however much it may be indulged in in other tribunals. Do you desire to say anything, Mr. Hightone?

HIGHTONE.—Yes, your Honor. There is one topic of inquiry that has suggested itself to my mind—and I would here remark en passant that my mind has always from childhood, been peculiarly constituted for the solution of legal problems—and that is, that our affidavit has not yet been read. It may commence, your Honor, if the error into which your mind seems to have lapsed as to a defect in its structure. (Aside to a lawyer behind) that's a capital joke, isn't it?

JUDGE.—It is unnecessary to read the affidavit However, much ordinary intellects may require the assistance of such aids, in order to the entire comprehension of legal propositions, the mind of the Court has no need of such dependence. It grasps intuitively the whole subject in all its breadth and scope, and is now prepared to decide the entire question. Constitutional provisions are always to be construed in pare materia, and, if the bar would devote the thorough attention to that rule that the Court has, they would become more competent to perform the duties belonging to their sphere of making suggestions to the Court. That simple test is decisive of this application. I do not propose to reason this topic out through all its ramnifications, but if the bar would examine it, they would arrive at the same conclusion as the Court. The application is denied.

More "Manifestations" among the Furniture.

We find the following paragraph going the rounds of the press:—

"A young girl of thirteen, in Paris, Miss Dumesnil, is said to be imbued with a fluid of an extraordinary attractive power, which attracts all objects of wood which surround her Chairs and tables are instantly attracted towards her when she approaches near to them. She has only become possessed of this attractive faculty for the last few weeks. The phenomenon has been witnessed by many persons to whom she is known, and the Faculty will probably be called upon to give explanation in regard to it. The writer adds that a great personage has sent for the girl, to be convinced of the truth of the extraordinary accounts which have obtained publicity respecting her. The girl is employed as a wood polisher, and lives with her parents, who are poor people."

To us there appears nothing at all extraordinary in the above. The words;—"The girl is employed as a wood polisher," explain anything that might else appear mysterious. Miss Dumesnil has no doubt in the course of her occupation, polished many hundreds of chairs and tables, and the chairs and tables which "are instantly attracted towards her when she approaches them" are doubtless some of those which have been polished by her laying on of hands, flannel, sweet oil, etc., and approach her to express their gratitude. Just let Miss Dumesnil be put in a strange furniture store where none of the furniture she had polished was, and not a table or chair would wag a leg. Pshaw! the "mysteries of Spiritualism" are very easily explained after all if people will only take time to think about them.

"Alta" Latin.

The writers engaged on the Alta, tear the dead languages like ghouls, befoul them like obscene harpies. The literary critic perpetrates the following in Sunday's issue:

"The Galaxy defends Swinburne and lauds Walt Whitman to the skies. Arcades est ambo; but Swinburne is gentlemanly and scholarly even in his vices, and Whitman adds to the license of the sensualist the manners and tastes of a rowdy.

Was there no little boy commencing to learn Latin Grammar at hand to tell the literary critic of the Alta not to stick est in between Arcades and ambo, and thus say "both Swinburne and Walt Whitman is Arcadians?" "Blackguards both" was what he intended to say, and having some misty idea of "Arcades ambo" being used to express that idea, he thought to show his classical knowledge by adding est.

The Toast of "The Press" Responded to by Mr. Samuel Williams.

The Press may esteem itself fortunate when on being toasted at a dinner, a worthy member of the body is found present to return thanks for the compliment in becoming terms. The toast of "The Press" was the fourteenth regular toast at the "Grand China Mail Banquet," given on the last day of the past year at the Occidental Hotel. This toast was not, on this occasion, responded to—as has too often been the case—by some snatcher up of trifles of news in the shape of an uneducated "local reporter." One of the editors of the Bulletin, the best newspaper published on the Pacific Coast, arose on behalf of "The Press." Mr. Samuel Williams responded. Mr. Samuel Williams is a gentleman respected by all who know him for the many good qualities which he possesses; no more reputable member of the Press—as regards private character and kindness of heart—can be found; therefore all the members of the Press present were pleased when they saw Mr. Samuel Williams rise to respond to the toast. The first words which Mr. Samuel Williams, one of the editors of the San Francisco Bulletin uttered, were these:

"The Press is proud to find itself in such good company. For once, at least, in spite of its plebeian origin, it has the entrée of "our best society.'"

We must state here, that the report which is afloat, to the effect that Mr. Samuel Williams was interrupted here is untrue. There were no cries from the gentlemen of the Press present of, "speak for yourself, Mr. Williams," "I've never been a printer's devil," "Plebeian origin he blowed," "Do you think the toast of 'The Press' means a printing press with rollers and ink?" "Don't insult Shakspeare," etc., etc., which mischievous people have declared were uttered. We do not believe that Mr. Williams heard any such remarks even if any such were made. Mr. Samuel Williams, after alluding to a remark made to him by Mr. Moore, English Consul at Beyrout, when he, (Mr. Samuel Williams,) was traveling in Syria, gave full rein to his fancy and told those present what he had imagined while sitting engaged in eating his dinner. He said:

"I expect to be greeted on my arrival at Hongkong by the familiar salutation of "Have a cab, sir?"

In San Francisco the familiar salutation is, "Hack, sir?" but let that pass. Mr. Williams, with a careful remembrance of the advertising patrons of the Bulletin, said:

"I expect to have my eyes regaled by that inspiring symbol of civilization, 'Try Ward's Shirts;' to see 'Hostetter' and 'Chevalier's Life for the Hair' staring at me along the lines of Chinese railroads, in Chinese omnibusses, and in Chinese hotels and restaurants; and to see 'Plantation Bitters' placarded in mammoth letters on the great Chinese Wall."

After an allusion to Squarza, (which did not do him a cent of good as he has sold out,) a kind remark about the Spirit of the Times, for which Borneck should be grateful, a slight advertisement of the Cliff House, a suggestion that Martin's is the best place to lunch, (for which Martin should certainly stand Veuve Clicquot,) a kindly mention of Maguire's Opera House and an allusion to the News Letter, (which should entitle Mr. Williams to a seat in the first avitor which starts,) the representitive of the Press closed his speech. Now this was an after dinner speech, and had Mr. Williams not made use of the expressions.—"The Press is proud to find itself in such good company. For once, at least, in spite of its plebeian origin, it has the entrée of our best society," we would not have criticised it. The opinion which we expressed of Mr. Williams at the commencement we adhere to, but we maintain that he evinced very bad taste in many portions of his speech.

Extraordinary Spiritual Manifestations in the "Alta" office.

The public have been already made aware of the fact that at half-past three o'clock on Thursday morning, the first and fourth pages of the Alta were "pied" while on their way to the press room. Every one was sorry to hear this; every one admired the energy evinced by the proprietors in causing the matter destroyed to be again set up so speedily that the paper was issued by 9 o'clock. A report that this accident to the forms took place in consequence of the car on which they were placed breaking down, has been industriously circulated. It is well known that the proprietors of the Alta have given but little assistance to the doctrine of Spiritualism, which they consider baleful as tending to increase insanity in our midst. Therefore it is not to be wondered at, that the proprietors thought fit to conceal the real cause of the misfortune which befel their forms from the public. As the facts of the case have, however, come to our knowledge—whether naturally or super-naturally we decline to state—we make them public. On the morning of Thursday, the forms had been securely locked up under the personal supervision of John McComb, who understands his business as foreman too well to run any risks. They had been placed in a substantially built and almost new car, (beautifully varnished and ornamented with silver mountings,) when a burst of triple thunder rolled through the composition room, (which is more like a parlor than a workshop,) a lurid flash of blue fire surrounded the chases in which the forms were bound; the solid masses of heavy metal sprang into the air and fell face downward on the floor; raps were heard in all parts of the room; shrieks of demoniacal laughter were heard; the deed was accomplished. The proprietors of the Alta are all well aware of the cause of these manifestations; but for the reason above mentioned they have suppressed the facts. THE GHOST OF THE FLAG PIED THE FORMS OF THE ALTA.

CHAPTER IV.—THE SHADOW LIGHTENED.

LONG before Mr. Carruthers, impelled by the irresistible force of routine, which not all the concern, and even alarm, occasioned him by Mrs. Carruther's condition could subdue, had issued forth upon his daily tour of inspection, Clare's letters had been safely posted, by her own hand, at the village. The large white-faced clock over the stables at Poynings striking six as Clare Carruthers returned, with a faint flutter of satisfaction that her errand had been safely accomplished, contending with the dreariness and dread which filled her heart. She put away her hat and cloak, changed her dress, which was wet with the dew, and sat down by the door of the room to listen for the first stir of life in the house.

Soon she heard her uncle's step, lighter, less creaky, than usual, and went out to meet him. He did not show any surprise on seeing her so early, and the expression of his face told her in a moment that he had no good news of the invalid to communicate.

"Brookes says she has had a very bad night," he said, gravely. "I am going to send for Munns at once, and to telegraph to London for more advice." Then he went on in a state of subdued creak, and Clare, in increased bewilderment and misery, went to Mrs. Carruthers's room, where she found the reign of dangerous illness seriously inaugurated.

Doctor Munns came, and early in the afternoon a grave and polite gentleman arrived from London, who was very affable, but rather reserved, and who was also guilty of the unaccountable bad taste of suggesting a shock in connection with Mrs. Carruthers' illness. He also was emphatically corrected by Mr. Carruthers, but not with the same harshness which had marked that gentleman's reception of Dr. Munn's suggestion.

Before the London physician made his appearance, Clare and her uncle had met at breakfast; she took her place opposite her uncle with a face whose pallor and expression of deep-seated trouble even that unobservant and self-engrossed potentate could not fail to notice. He did observe the alteration in Clare's look, and was not altogether displeased by it It argued deep solicitude for Mrs. Carruthers of Poynings—an extremely proper sentiment; so Mr. Carruthers consoled his neice, after his stately fashion, acknowledging, at the same time, the unaccountable vagaries of fever, and assuring Clare that there was nothing infectious in the case—a subject on which it had never occurred to the girl to feel any uneasiness. The conversation was interrupted by the arrival of the post, and Mr. Carruther's attention was again drawn to the subject of the murder and the possibility of promoting his own importance in connection with it. Clare's pale face turned paler as her uncle took up the first letter of the number presented to him by Thomas, footman, that official looking peculiarly intelligent on the occasion; for the letter bore the magic inscription, "On Her Majesty's Service," and the seal of the Home Office.

Mr. Carruthers took some time to read the letter even with the aid of the gold eye glasses. It came from Mr. Dalrymple, who wrote an abnormally bad hand even for a government official. The irrepressible pompousness of the man showed itself even in this crisis of affairs, as he perused the document, and laid it down upon the table under the hand armed with the eye-glasses. "Hem! my dear," he began, "this letter is connected with the matter I mentioned to you yesterday. You remember, I dare say, about the murder, and the inquiry I was requested by the government to make at Amherst."

Oh yes, Clare remembered; she had been very much interested. Had anything since transpired?

"Nothing of any moment. This letter is from Mr. Dalyrimple. The gentleman who came here, as I told you, from Lord Wolstenholm."

Clare, still breathless, bowed. There was no use in trying to accelerate Mr. Carruthers' speech. He was not to be hurried.

"He writes to me that the Home Secretary regrets very much the failure of our inquiries at Amherst, in eliciting any information concerning the only person on whom suspicion has as yet alighted. He informs me that, as I expected, and as I explained to you yesterday"—Mr. Carruthers paused condescendingly for Clare's silent gesture of assent—"the jury at the coroner's inquest—it closed yesterday—have returned an open verdict, wilful murder against some person or persons unknown, and the police have been instructed to use all possible vigilance to bring the criminal to light."

"Have they learned anything further about the dead man?" asked Clare, with a timid look, half of anxiety, half of avoidance, towards the newspaper, which Mr. Carruthers had not yet opened, and which no member of the family would have ventured to touch unsanctioned by the previous perusal of its august head.

"About the murdered man? No, I believe not. Mr. Dayrimple further informs me that the fur-lined coat, and all the other less remarkable articles of clothing found on the body, are placed in the hands of the police, in the hope of future identification. There is nothing more to be done, then, that I can see. Can you suggest anything, Clare?" Mr. Carruthers asked the question in a tone almost of banter, as though there were something ridiculous in his expecting a suggestion from such a quarter, but with a very little real anxiety nevertheless.

"I—I really do not know, uncle," returned Clare; "I cannot tell. You are quite sure Evans told you all he knew?"

"Everything," replied Mr. Carruthers. "The clue furnished by the coat was very slight, but it was the only one. I am convinced, myself, that the man who wore the coat, and was last seen in company with the murdered man, was the man who committed the murder." Clare shivered. "But," continued Mr. Carruthers, in an argumentative tone, "the thing to be established is the identity of the man who wore the coat with the man who bought it six weeks ago."

A bright flush rose on Clare's cheeks—a flush of surprise, of hope. "Is there any doubt about that, uncle?" she asked. "The waiter described the man, didn't he? Besides no one would part with an overcoat in six weeks."

"That is by no means certain," said Mr. Carruthers, with an air of profound wisdom. "Artists and writers, and foreigners, and, generally, people of the vagabond kind, sell and barter their clothes very frequently. The young man whom Evans describes might have been any one, from his purposeless, indistinguishable description; the waiter's memory is clearer, as is natural, being newer."

"And what is the description he gives?" asked Clare, firmly.

"You will find it in the weekly paper, my dear," returned Mr. Carruthers, stretching his hand out towards the daily journal. "Meantime, let's see yesterday's proceedings."

At this moment the footman entered the room, and informed him that Mr. Evans, the tailor, from Amherst, wished to be permitted to speak to him as soon as convenient. With much more alacrity than he usually displayed, Mr. Carruthers desired that Evans should be shown into the library and declared his intention of going to speak to him immediately.

"I have no doubt, Clare, that he has come about this business," said Mr. Carruthers, when the servant had left the room. With this consolatory assurance, he left her to herself. She snatched up the newspaper and read a brief account of the proceedings of the previous day—the close of the inquest, and some indignant remarks upon the impunity with which so atrocious a crime had, to all appearance, been committed, which wound up with a supposition that this murder was destined to be included in the number of those mysteries whose impenetrability strengthened the hand of the assassin, and made our police system the standing jest of continental nations. How ardently she hoped, how nearly she dared to pray, that it might indeed be so! She lingered in the breakfast-room waiting for her uncle's return. Three letters lay on the table still unopened, and when Clare looked at them she found they were addressed to Mrs. Carruthers, and that two of the three were from America. The post mark on each were New York, and on one were stamped the words "Too late."

"She is too ill to read any letters now, or even to be told there are any," thought Clare, "I had better put them away, or ask my uncle to do so."

She was looking at the third letter, which was from George Dallas; but she had never seen his writing, to her knowledge, and the two words, which he had written on the slip of paper she had seen, being a christian and surname, afforded her no opportunity of recognising it as that of Paul Ward; when Mr. Carruthers returned, looking very pompous and fussy.

"I shall communicate with the Home Office immediately," he began. "This is very important. Evans has been here to tell me he has read all the proceedings at the inquest, and the waiter's description of the suspected individual tallies precisely with his own recollection of the purchaser of the coat."

"But uncle," said Clare with quick intelligence, "you told me the man's evidence and Evans' description were as vague as possible. Indeed, I was struck by what you said. 'A description that describes nothing,' were your words."

"Yes, yes, I remember, of course, my dear," replied Mr. Carruthers, graciously, "but then, you see, I am bound to communicate with the Home Office. If Mrs. Carruthers' illness did not render my absence improper and impossible, I should go to London myself, and lay the matter before Lord Wolstenholme; but, as I cannot do that, I must write at once." Mr. Carruthers, in his secret soul, regarded the obligation with no little dread, and would have been grateful for a suggestion which he would not have condescended to ask for.

"Then I will leave you, uncle,' said Clare, making a strong effort to speak as cheerfully as possible, "to your task of telling the big wigs that there's nothing more to be done or known down here. You might make them laugh, if such solemn, grand people ever laugh, by telling them how the rural mind believes two vaguenesses to make a certainty, and make them grateful that Evans came to you, and not to them, with his mare's nest of corroborative evidence."

Clare's fair face was sharpened with anxiety as she spoke, despite the brightness of her tone, and she had narrowly watched the effect of her words. Her uncle felt that they conveyed precisely the hint he required, and was proportionately relieved.

"Of course, of course," he answered, in his grandest manner; and Clare moved towards the door, when, remembering the letters, she said,

"There are some letters for Mrs. Carruthers, uncle. I fancy she is too ill to see them—two are from America; will you take them?"

"I take them, Clare, why?" asked her uncle, in a tone of dignified surprise.

"Only because, being foreign letters, I thought they might require attention—that's all," said Clare, feeling herself rebuked for a vulgarity. "They come from New York."

"Probably from Mr. Felton," said Mr. Carruthers, pointing the gold eye-glasses at the letters in Clare's hand with dignified coldness, but making no attempt to look at them nearer.

"You had better lay them aside, or give them to Brookes or Dixon. I never meddle with Mrs. Carruthers' family correspondence."

Clare made her escape with the letters, feeling as if her ears had, morally speaking, been boxed; and diverted, for a little by the sensation from the devouring anxiety she had felt that Mr. Carruthers should communicate in the tone which she had tried to insinuate with the dignitaries of the Home Office.

The door of Mrs. Carruthers' room was open, and the curtain partly withdrawn, when Clare reached it. She called softly to Dixon, but received no reply. Then she went in and found the housekeeper again in attendance upon the patient. To her inquires she received from Mrs. Brookes very discouraging replies, and the old woman stated her conviction strongly that it was going to be a very bad business, and that Clare had much better go to the Sycamores.

"You can't do any good here, Miss Carruthers," said the old woman; and Clare thought she had never heard her speak so steamily and harshly. "I don't know that anyone can do any good; but you can't anyhow, and the fever may be catching."

Clare's eyes filled with tears, not only because she loved Mrs. Carruthers, not only because another trouble was added to the crushing misery that had fallen upon her, but also because it hurt her gentle nature keenly to feel herself of no account.

"No," she said, in a low voice, "I know I am of no use, I am not her child. If I were, I should not be expected to leave her. And," she added, bitterly, for the first time treading on forbidden ground, "more than that, if it were not for me her son might be with her now, perhaps."

"Hush, hush, pray," whispered Mrs. Brooks, with a frightened glance at the bed; "don't say that word! She may hear and understand more than we think."

Clare looked at her in bewilderment, but obeyed her, and asked no questions.

"These came just now," she said; "my uncle desired me to give them to you."

She put the letters into the old woman's hand, and crossed the room, leaving it by the opposite door, which communicated with Mrs. Carruthers' dressing-room. As she passed through the inner apartment, which opened on the corridor, she observed that the portrait of George Dallas, which had hung upon the wall as long as she remembered the room, was no longer there.

The hidden anguish in her own heart, the secret which was chrushing her own young spirit, made the young girl quick to see and interpret any sign of similar sorrow and mystery.

"Mrs. Brookes has taken away her son's picture," Clare thought, as she slowly descended the stairs, "and she dreads his name being mentioned in her presence. Dr. Munns asked if she had had a shock, and seemed to impute her illness to something of the kind. There is something wrong with George Dallas, and the two know it,"

When Miss Carruthers left her, Mrs. Brookes broke the seal of one of the letters without a moment's hesitation, and read its contents, standing sheilded from any possible observation by the invalid by the curtains of the bed. The letter contained only a few lines:

"I am going away out of England, for a little while, my dearest mother," George Dallas wrote. "It is necessary for the transaction of my business; but I did not know it would be so when I last communicated with you. Write to me at the subjoined address. your letter will be forwarded."

The address given was Routh's, at South Molton street.

The old woman sighed heavily as she read the letter, and then resumed her attendance on her patient.

The day waned, the London physician came and went. The household at Poynings learned little of their mistress' state. There was little to be learned. That night a letter was written to George Dallas, by Mrs. Brooks, which was a harder task to the poor old woman than she had ever been called upon to fulfill. With infinite labor, she wrote as follows:

"My dear Master George. Your letter has come, so I know you are not in England, and I am not sure but that some one else may see this. Your mother is very ill, in consequence of what she has seen in the papers. I do not believe it is as bad as it seems, though how bad that is, thank God, no one but your mother and I know, or can ever know, I hope and trust. Think of all the strongest and most imploring things I could say to you, my own dear boy, if it was safe to say anything, and if you can put us out of suspense, by writing, not to her, not on any account to her, but to me, do so. But if you can't, George—and think what I feel in saying that if—keep away, don't let her hear of you, don't let her think of you in danger. Anyhow, God save, and help, and forgive you.

"Your affectionate old Nurse,

"ELLEN."

The days went on, as time travels in sickness and in health, and there was little change in Mrs. Carruthers, and little hope at Poynings. The fever had been pronounced not infectious, and Clare had not been banished to the Sycamores. No fresh alarm had arisen to agitate her, no news of the suspected man had been obtained. The matter had apparently been consigned to oblivion. With the subsidence of her first terror and agitation, a deeper horror and dread had grown upon Clare. Supposing, as it seemed, that he was safe now, Paul Ward was still a guilty wretch, a creature to be shunned by the pure, even in thought. And the more she felt this, and thought of it, the more frankly Clare confessed to her own heart that she had loved him, that she had set him up, with so little knowledge of him after their chance meeting, as an idol in the shrine of her girlish fancy—an idol defaced and overthrown now, a shrine for ever defiled and desecrated. She was glad to think she had warned him; she wondered how much that warning had contributed to his security. She strove hard to banish the remembrance of him in all but its true aspect of abhorrence, but she did not always succeed; and, in the innocent girl's dreams, the smile, the voice, the frank kindly words would often come again and make her waking to the jarring gladness of the morning terrible. A shadow fell upon her beauty, the gleeful tone died out of her voice; the change of an indelible sorrow passed upon the girl, but passed unnoticed by herself or any others.

The days went on, as time travels, in sorrow and in joy: and at length change came in Mrs. Carruthers, and there was hope at Poynings. Not hope, indeed, that she could ever be again as she had been, beautiful and stately in her serene, and honored matronhood, in her bright intelligence and dignity. That was not to be. She recovered; that is she did not die, but she died too much of the past. She was an old woman from thenceforth, and all her beauty, save the immortal beauty of form, had left her very quiet, very patient and gentle, but of feeble nerves, and with little memory of the past, and little attention or interest in the present, she was the merest wreck of what she had been. Her faithful old servant was not so much distressed by the change as were her husband and Clare. She had her own reasons for thinking it better that it should be so, For many days after convalescence had been declared, she had watched and waited, sick with apprehension for some sign of recollection on the part of the patient, but none came, and the old woman, while she grieved with exceeding bitterness over the wreck of all she so dearly loved, thanked God in her heart that even thus relief had come. None had come otherwise. George Dallas had made no sign.

So the time went on, and summer was in its full pomp and pride when preparations were being made on a scale suitable to the traveling arrangements of magnates of the importance of Mr. Carruthers of Poynings for a continental tour, recommended by the physicians in attendance as a means for the complete restoration of Mrs. Carruthers. The time named for the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Carruthers had nearly arrived, and it had just been arranged that Clare should remain at the Sycamores during their absence, when Mr. Carruthers startled Mrs. Brookes considerably by asking her if she could inform him where a communication might be expected to find Mr. George Dallas?

"I do not consider it proper that the young man should be left in ignorance of his mother's state of health, and her absence from England," he said, with less stateliness than usual; "and though I do not inquire into the manner and frequency of his communications with Mrs. Carruthers, I believe I am correct in supposing he has not written to her lately."

"Not lately, sir," replied Mrs. Brookes.

The result of this colloquy was that Mrs. Brookes gave Mr. Carruthers Routh's address at South Molton-street, and that Mr. Carruthers addressed a short epistle to George Dallas, in which he curtly informed his step-son that his mother, having just recovered from a dangerous illness which had enfeebled her mind considerably, was about to travel on the Continent for an indefinite period, during which, if he (Mr. Carruthers) should see any cause for so doing, he would communicate further with Mr. George Dallas. This letter was posted on the day which witnessed the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Carruthers "and suite" (as the County Chronicle was careful to notice) from Poynings; and Mr. Carruthers felt much conscious self-approval for having written it, and especially for having timed the writing of it so well. "Sooner, he might have made an excuse of it for coming here," thought the astute gentleman; "and it would have been heartless not to have written at all."

For once in his life, Mr. Carruthers of Poynings had written a letter of importance.

CHAPTER V.—IN THE MUIDERSTAAT.

High houses, board, jolly, and red-faced, standing now on the edges of quays or at the feet of bridges, now in quaint trim little gardens, whose close-shaven turf is gaudy with brilliant bulbs, or over-shadowed by box and yew, but always fringing the long, shallow, black canals, whose sluggish waters scarcely ripple under the passing barge. Water, water, everywhere, and requiring everybody's first consideration, dammed out by vast dykes and let in through numerous sluices, spanned by nearly three hundred bridges, employing a perfect army of men to watch it and tend it, to avail themselves of its presence and yet to keep it in subjection; for if not properly looked after and skillfully managed, it might at any moment submerge the city; avenues of green trees running along the canal banks and blooming freshly in the thickest portions of the commerce-crowded quays; innumerable windmills on the horizon; picture-galleries rich in treasures of Rubens, Rembrandt, Vandyke, and Teniers; dockyards, where square and sturdy ships are built by square and sturdy men, in solemn silence and with much pipe-smoking; asylums, homes, almshouses, through which a broad stream of well-administered charity is always flowing. A population of grave burghers, and chattering vrows, and the fattest, shiniest, and most old-fashioned children; of out-landish sailors and Jews of the grand old type, who might have sat, and whose ancestors probably did sit, as models to Rembrandt; of stalwart bargemen and canal-tenders, of strangers, some pleasure-seeking, but the great majority intent on business; for whatever may be the solemn delights of its inhabitants, to a stranger accustomed to other capitals there are few gaieties to be met with in the city to which George Dallas had wended his way—Amsterdam.

To George Dallas this mattered very little. Of the grosser kinds of pleasure he had had enough and more than enough; the better feelings of his nature had been awakened, and nothing could have induced him to allow himself to drift back into the slough from which he had emerged. It was on the first morning after his arrival in Amsterdam, actuated by surroundings in an extraordinary degree, he had, while in London, been completely fascinated by the combined influence of Routh and Harriet; and had he remained with them he would, probably, never have shaken off that influence, or been anything but their ready instrument. But so soon as he had left them the fascination was gone, and his eyes were opened to the degradation of his postion, and the impossibility, so long as he continued with his recent associates, of retrieving himself in the eyes of the world—of being anything to Clare Carruthers. This last thought decided him—he would break with Stewart Routh; yes, and with Harriet, at once! He would sell the bracelet and send the proceeds to Routh with a letter, in which he would delicately but firmly express his determination and take farewell of him and Harriet. Then he would return to London, and throw himself into business at once. There was plenty for him to do at the Mercury, the chief had said, and——No! he must not go back to London, he must not expose himself to temptation; at all events, until he was more capable of resisting it. Now, there would be Routh, with his jovial blandishments, and Deane, and all the set, and Harriet, most dangerous of all! In London he would fall back into George Dallas, the outcast, the reprobate, the black sheep, not rise into Paul Ward, the genius; and it was under the latter name that he had made acquaintance with Clare, and that he hoped to rise into fame and repute.

But though the young man had, as he imagined, fully made up his mind as to his future course, he lounged through a whole day in Amsterdam before he took the first step necessary for its pursuance—the negotiation of the bracelet and the transmission of the money to Routh. At last it was absolutely necesary that some action should be taken, and George consulted the polyglot waiter of the hotel as to the best means of disposing of some valuable diamonds which he had with him.

The question was evidently one to which the polygot waiter was well accustomed, for he answered at once, "Diamants to buy is best by Mr. Dieverbrug, in Muiderstratt." That he was a diamond merchant in a large way of business, speaking English, frequently visiting England, and likely to give as good, if not a better price than any one else in the trade. The polyglot added that he himself was not a bad judge of what he persisted in calling "dimants;" and as this speech was evidently a polite hint, George showed him the stones. The polyglot admired them very much, and pronounced them, in his opinion, worth between two and three hundred pounds a valuable hint to George, who expected Mr. Dieverbrug would call upon him to name his price, and if any absurd sum was asked, the intending vendor might be looked upon with suspicion. George thanked him and set out to visit Mr. Dieverbrug.

The Muiderstraat is the Jews' quarter of Amsterdam. The day was fine, and nearly all the population was either standing outside its doors or lolling at its windows, chaffering, higgling, joking, scolding. George Dallas walked slowly along with difficulty, threading his way through the various groups, amused with all he saw, and speculating within himself as to the probable personal appearance of Mr. Dieverbrug. The diamond-merchant, George imagined, would probably be an old man, with grey hair and spectacles, and a large hooked nose, like one of Rembrandt's "Misers," seated in a small shop, surrounded by the rarest treasures exquisitely set. But when he arrived at the number which the polyglot had given him as Mr. Dieverbrug's residence, he found a small shop indeed, but it was a bookseller's, and it was not until after some little time that he spied a painted inscription on the door-post, directing Mr. Dieverbrug's visitors's to the first floor, whither George at once proceeded.

At a small wooden table, on which stood a set of brass balance weights, sat a man of middle height and gentlemanly appearance, dressed in black. The Hebraic character was not strongly marked in any of his features, though it was preceptible to an acute observer in the aquiline nose and the full red lips. He raised his eyes from a small red leather memorandum-book or diary which he had been studying as Dallas entered the room, and gave his visitor a grave salutation.

"Am I addressing Mr. Dieverbrug?" said Dallas in English.

"I am Mr. Dieverbrug," he replied, in the same language, speaking with perfect ease and with very little foreign accentuation, "at your service."

"I have been recommended to come to you. I am, as you have probably already recognised, an Englishman, and I have some jewels for sale, which it may, perhaps, suit you to buy."

"You have them with you?"

"Yes they are here;" and George took out his cherished case and placed it in Mr. Dieverbrug's hand.

Mr. Dieverburg opened the case quietly, and walked with it towards the window. He then took out the stones and held them to the light, then taking from his waistcoat-pocket a small pair of steal nippers, he picked up each stone separately, breathed upon it, examined it attentively, and then replaced it in the case. When he had gone through this operation with all the stones, he said to George:

"You are not a diamond merchant?"

"No, indeed!" said Dallas, with a half-laugh; "not I."

"You have never," said Mr. Dieverbrug, looking at him steadfastly from under his bushy eyebrows—"you have never been in a jewel-house?"

"In a jewel-house?" echoed George.

"What you call a jeweller's shop?"

"Never have been in a jeweller's shop? Oh yes, often."

"Still you fail my meaning. You have never been in a jeweller's shop as employé, as assistant?",

"Assistant at a jeweller's—ah, thank you! now I see what you're aiming at. I've never been an assistant in a jeweller's shop, you ask, which is a polite way of inquiring if I robbed my master of these stones! Thank you very much; if you have that opinion of me, perhaps I had better seek my bargain elsewhere." And George Dallas, shaking all over, and very much flushed in the face, extended his hand for the case.

Mr. Dieverbrug smiled softly as he said, "If I had thought that, I would have bid you go about your business at once. There are plenty of merchants at Amsterdam who would buy from you, no matter whence you came; but it is my business to ask such questions as to satisfy myself. Will you have back your diamonds, or shall I ask my question?"

He spoke in so soft a tone, and he looked so placid and so thoroughly uncaring which way the discussion ended, that George Dallas could scarcely forbear laughing as he replied, "Ask away."

"Ask away," repeated Mr. Dieverbrug, still with his soft smile. "Well then, you are not a jeweller's employé; I can tell that by your manner, which also shows me that you are not what you call swell-mob-man—rascal—escroc. So you come to me with valuable diamonds to sell; my questions are: How do you get these diamonds? Who are you?"

For an instant George Dallas paused in his reply, while he felt the blood rise in his cheeks. He next looked Mr. Dieverbrug straight in the face as he said, "These were family diamonds, I inherited them from my mother—who is dead—and was advised to come over hear to sell them, this being the best market. As to myself, I am a literary man, a contributor to newspapers, and an author."

"Ah, ha! you write in newspapers and books? You are feuilletonist, author?" And as Mr. Dieverbrug said these words, he took up a stick which stood by the side of the fireplace and thumped heavily on the floor. His thumping seemed to awaken a kind of smothered response from the regions below them, and before George Dallas had recovered from his surprise the door was opened, and an old gentleman of fantastic appearance entered the room—a very little man, with an enormous head, which was covered with a tight-fitting little senll-cap, large eyes glaring ont of silver-rimmed speetaeles, a sallow puckered face fringed with a short stubby white beard, a large aquiline nose, and thin tight lips. Buttouing immediately under his ehin and reaching to his feet—no very long distauce—the little man wore a greasy red flaunel gaberdine dressing-gown, with flat horn buttons in a row down the front, underneath which appeared a dubiously dirty pair of flannel stoekiugs and bright red leather slippers. With one hand the little man leaned ou an ivory-handled crutch stick; in the other he carried a yellow-paper covered book—Tauehuitz edition of some English author. As he entered the room he gave a sharp, rapid, eomprehensive glauee at George through his spectacles, made him a deferential bow, and theu took up his position in the elosest proximity to Mr. Dieverbrug, who at onee addressed him iu Dutch with much volubility.

When they had finished their parley, during which both of them looked at the diamonds and then at George, and then waived their fingers in each other's faees, and beat the palms of their hands, and shrugged their shoulders as though they never intended their heads to be again seen, Mr. Dieverbrug turned to George, and said. "This is is my brother-in-law, Mr. Schaub, who keeps the bookseller's shop beneath us. He is agent for some English booksellers and newspapers, and knows more about authors than you would think. It is no object of us to disguise to you that he brings his experienee to aid me in deciding whether or not I eonsider myself justified in making a dealing with you for these stones."

"Thanks! I eomprehend perfectly, and, of eourse, cannot object; though," added George, with a smile, "I am afraid I have not as yet made sufficient mark in English literature to render me a classic, or even to have gained a eontinental reputation for my name. Stay, though. Mr. Schaub, if I remember rightly, is agent for one London paper to which I have eontributed under my signature—the Mercury, Mr. Schaub? I thonght so, and perhaps you have seen some articles there signed Puul Ward?"

"M-ja! m-ja! Wass von die 'Strangers in London,' von Paul Ward, am Nordjten, Hollandisehen, Deutschen seapeople, von sailors would call zum visitiren?"

"That's it, sir! Descriptions," eontinued George, turning to Mr. Dieverbrug, "of the foreign sea-going populations of London."

"M-ja, of Highway, of Shadcliffe, Ratcliffe, Shadwell, vot you call! M-ja, of Paul Ward writings I am acquaint."

"And you are Paul Ward?" asked Mr. Dieverbrug.

"I am that apparently distinguished person," said George.

Then Mr. Dieverbrug and Mr. Schaub plunged pell-mell into another conversation, in which, though the tongues rattled volubly enough, the shoulders, and the eyebrows, and the fingers played almost as important parts, the result being that Mr. Dieverburg turned to George and said, "I am quite satisfied to undertake this affair, Mr. Ward, from what my brothin-law has said of your position. Another question is, what shall I give you for the stones?"

"From what your brother-in-law has said of my position, Mr. Dieverbrug," said George, "it will, I presume, be apparent to you that I am uot likely to be much versed in such matters, and that I must, to a great extent, be depeudent on you."

"But you have some notion of price?"

"I have a notion—nothing more."

"And that notion is—?"

"Well, I imagine the worth of the stones is about two hundred and fifty pounds!"

At these words Mr. Schaub gave a short sharp scream of horror, plunging his hands up to the elbows in the poekets of the red-flannel gaberdine, und glaring at George through the silver-rimmed glasses, Mr. Dieverbrug was not so wildly affected; he only smilled the soft smile a little more emphatically than before, and said:

"There is now no doubt, my dear sir, even if we had doubted before, of your living in the regions of romance! These must be Monte Christo diamonds, of M. Dumas' own setting to judge by the value you place on them—eh?"

"Wass won hondret fifty is vat worths," said Mr. Schaub.

But fortified in his own opinion of the polygot waiter, who evidently had not spoken without some knowledge, George at once and peremptorily declined his bid, and so to work they went. The stones were had out again, re-examined, weighed in the brass balances, breathed upon, held up to the light between the steel pincers, and at length, after a sharp discussion, carried on with the most vivid pantomime between the brothers-iu law, Mr. Dieverbrug consented to buy them for one hundred and eighty pounds, and George Dallus accepted his offer. Then from the recesses of a drawer in the little wooden table Mr. Dieverbrug produced a cash-box and counted out the sum in Dutch coin and gulden notes, und handing it to George; and shaking hands with him, the transaction was completed.

After disposing of the diamonds to Mr. Dieverbrug, George Dallas was followed down stairs by Mr. Schaub who drew him into his den of a bookseller's shop, with the suggestion that he had best change the money into English.

"I'm not going back to Londou, Mr. Schaub," said Gearge, after a few moments' puzzling over the old man's meaning, "but I shall want to change this money, as I must send some of it, the larger portion, to England by to-night's post, and I am going to the bank to change it."

"Wass! der bank! der nousenee! It is the old Schaub vot will change! Give de goot rates and all! Der Schaub vill change die gulden for den bank notes."

"It does not matter to me much who ehanges it, so long as I get the proper value!" said George, with a laugh, "and if the old Sehaub, as you call yourself, can give me bank-notes for a hundred and forty pounds, I'll say done with you ut onee!"

"Wass vat wos 'done' mit me for hundret forty pounds! See—first will make the door to. Let das folk call miser old Schaub, but not let das folk see vot old Sehaub misers. Ha ha!"

So saying, the old gentleman closed the door of the shop and locked it carefully. Then he retired to the baek of the counter, removed several heavy old books from one of the shelves, and unlocked a secret closet in the wall. When he turned again to George, whom he had left on the other side of the counter, he had a little roll of English bank-notes in his hand. From this he selected four notes—two of the value of fifty and two of twenty pounds. These he handed to Dallas, reeeiving the equivalent in Dutch money.

"I am very much obliged to you indeed, Mr. Schaub," said George. "By doing this for me, you have saved my going to the bank, and a good deal of tronble."

"Obliged to him is not at ull, mien goot freund Vart—Paul Vart," said the old gentleman. "Miser das tolk ealls old Schaub, but it is not that; he has his leetle commissions, vy not he as well as banks? Goot deal of money pass through old Schaub's hand, and of vot pass uone go clean through, always von little shticks to him fingers.

That night George Dallas wrote to Stewart Routh, enclosing him the money, and telling him that literary engagements had sprung up which might perhaps keep him some little time from London. The letter dispatched, he felt a different man. The tie was loosed, the coupling-chain was broken! No longer enthralled by a debt of gratitude to vice, he could try what he could do to make a name—a name which his mother should not blush to hear—a name which should be murmured with delight by Clare Carruthers.

A SOUR SERMON.

BY PRENTICE.

"SHALL not the dogs eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table?"

During the holidays I have tried to keep my eyes and ears open, my head clear, and my heart as full of charity for humanity as it is capable of holding.

I was rewarded for keeping in this condition of mind, by seeing many things by me unseen before.

I beheld proofs innumerable, of the truth, that as yet mankind are by no means willing that "The dogs shall eat of the crumbs which fall from their master's table."

You see I have lately turned my attention to scripture. Totally depraved and horribly wicked as I am, in an orthodox point of view, still, I find the occassional perusal of the Bible profitable and pleasant.

On Christmas and New Years, I beheld in the streets, multitudes of sad, weary, disappointed men, whose memory carried them back to the Christmas and New Years of "Old Lang Syne." They were made more miserable by contrasting the present with the past.

Many of these poor souls would gladly have partaken of a New Year's dinner in some family circle, and been warmed with cheerfulness by a drop of sympathy.

Many a New Year's dinner was devoured with all due stiffness and frigidity; the guest being at the time surrounded by that oppressive atmosphere of boredom, peculiar to the American "Holiday."

Had you gone out into the highways and byways, taken one of these poor wretches at random, stuffed him with roast turkey and oyster sauce on general principles, you might have baptised him with astonishment and gratitude, and "laid up for yourself treasures in Heaven."

Not so. The dogs were not allowed to partake of the crumbs which fell from their master's table. The masters gorged themselves to repletion, for fear the dogs might get a crumb. All this too, after coming from church, where the minister in your behalf earned his salary by thanking the Almighty for his goodness during the past year, while you cursed the sermon for its lack of brevity, or dozed, or reflected on the price of grain, or the rise and fall of stocks.

I saw watches presented to those who did not need watches, and plate to those having any amount of platter to spare. The rich exchanged costly presents among each other, and imagined themselves benevolent; but the crumbs doled to suffering humanity were few and far between.

The dogs were obliged to go out in the street and gnaw the cast off bones reposing in the unpicturesque gutter. E're next morn, many of the dogs themselves reposed in the gutters.

I heard numerous wishes for a "Merry Christmas" and a "Happy New Year," but in many cases the wishes were mere words. They would not bear the weight of a five cent piece.

When we go to Heaven, we may then get a little rest from the cares of business, and have a little time to send a few crumbs, not merely to those hungry for turkey, but to those starving for a word of sympathy and kindness. Until then, we shall look well to the riches which Providence has committed to our care, and duly beat, scold, and drive off those miserable dogs who would eat from the crumbs falling from their master's table.

I may preach a sweet sermon in this place again next Sunday.

AN EXTRA ROAR FROM THE "LION'S MOUTH."

San Francisco Newspaper Correspondents in the Eastern and Western States.

The Times has done good. The Alta and the Bulletin have been roused into a most energetic state. The Alta has a wonderfully gifted correspondent, resident in New York, and the Bulletin has one equally gifted in Chicago. The Alta's New York correspondent addresses the readers of that staid mercantile organ as "my dear Californians," and then says:

"To begin with: how much more satisfactory, when a body has to write a letter, to begin with 'My Dear,' or 'My Darling,' or 'My Beloved So and So,' and then have the fair object before one's gaze, or 'mind's eye,' during the whole time devoted to the epistle! But, then, I console myself with this thought—that perhaps not one little duck will be reading my letter, but many, many laughing eyes will look at these lines, and may be grow merrier: and then, again, they may possibly grow sad—for I feel somewhat grave to-night gentle reader. How can a sentimental body like myself feel otherwise, when the wind is howling round, and rattling the window sash as it does this evening?"

The rest of the letter, as well as the foregoing, leads us to the conclusion that the Alta's New York correspondent is an old maid addicted to drink, and that she was in a state of maudlin inebriation when she wrote the letter which appeared in Monday's issue. After mourning over the frequency of reports of divorce cases in the New York newspapers, the correspondent (he, she or it) says:

"To think of a man who has once sworn to protect a woman, who has taken a fair young girl to his heart and she has become the mother of his children; then to think of his hawking her frailties (if she really has them) before the public, to be published in every newspaper."

It must be a she, who is "hawking her frailties (which she most decidedly has, in the way of ungrammatical compositions and want of common sease)to be published in the Alta," This correspondent ends her letter thus:

"I have just been called from my letter by the cry of my baby-boy; for you must know, dear reader, that 'correspondents' have babies as well as any 'other man,' and that at a shrill little cry they will run as quickly to the nursery as the little wee thing's own mother. Oh the holy, tender thoughts that gather round the cradle! Just one glance at that sleeping child has made me feel as if I had been plunged in a bath of the waters of Innocence and had come forth purer and better. Surely, she who is baptised with the sacred name of mother, must be holier and better than the childless, for from association with the little cherubs, she must gather the sweet fragrance from their innocent young lives. Now I must cease this baby talk or I shall receive the anathemas of all the old maids and bachelors."

This is a nice sort of correspondent for the Alta. Poor old Granny Alta! She is, after a spasmodic effort to become sensible, relapsing into her dotage.

The Bulletin's "own correspondent," in Chicago, is certainly a man, and a man who understands his business. He devotes fifty-nine lines of his letter to an elaborate puff of the Nicolson pavement (which, at the rate of the Call's charges for * notices, should certainly bring him in $14. 75 in gold). The latter portion of his letter is devoted to abuse of John Woodard, one of the pioneer actors and theatrical managers of California, of whose career in this State, the Sacramento Union, sometime ago published a detailed account. We fear that both the Alta and Bulletin have been unhappy in their choice of correspondents; the latter's did not sign himself "R," nor did the former's sign himself "F," but their letters suggested those initals as being respectively appropriate.

Postage Paid!

The Alta of Monday says in its telegraphic column:—"Prepaid list of all promiaent persons, including members of Congress, graduates of West Point, etc., who joined the Rebellion will be sent to the House on reassembling." We don't exactly understand what the above announcement means. It may mean that the army of spies and informers sent South to make up the list of the men worth money who joined the rebellion have been paid before hand, or it may only mean that the list will be sent in "postage pre-paid."

LAURA CUPPY—Will lecture on Spiritualism and answer the religious objections thereto, on Sunday evening at Maguire's Opera House. Admission to Dress Circle and Parquet, 25 cents: Gallery 10 cents—merely enough to cover the expenses of house and gas. Questions will be solicited at the close of the lecture.

REMOVAL.—Dr. H. A. Benton has removed to Congress Hall building, Bush street, adjoining the Russ House, where he has procured increased facilities and advantages in medical and bath rooms. See his card.

AYER'S AMERICAN ALMANAC is now ready for delivery, gratis, by all Agents, to all who call for it.

Among the problems of high science which the Doctor presents in it, is the startling assertion that the friction of tides upon its surface, retards the earth's revolution upon its axis, or holds it back with a force of 6,000 millions of horse powers. Hence it is easy to see that without some counter force, the globe must rotate slower and slower, until its revolutions wholly cease. Then with perpetual night on one side, and a degree of cold far below any now known, we should have on the other a "fervent heat" from the sun, which would melt the rocks and make the mountains run like water. But we need feel no alarm. He shows a counter poise which nearly balances this resistance, and will maintain, substantially, the present mundane condition, through ages upon ages yet to come.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

LONGFELLOW'S LATEST.

"FLOWER-DE LUCE,' is the somewhat fanciful title of Longfellow's new volume of poems. The book includes "Palingenesi's," "Bridge of Cloud," "Hawthorne," "Kambula," "Killed at the Ford," "The Bells of Lynn," and other poems that have appeared during the past few years in the Atlantic Monthly. The following lyric is one of the most beautiful and characteristic things in the volume:

Beautiful lily, dwelling by still rivers,
Or solitary mere,
Or where the sluggish meadow-brook delivers
Its waters to the weir!

Thou laughest at the mill, the whirr and worry
Of spindle and of loom,
And the great wheel that toils amid the hurry
And rushing of the flume.

Born to purple, born to joy and pleasance,
Thou dost not toil nor spin,
But makest glad and radiant with thy presence,
The meadow and the lin.

The wind blows, and uplifts thy drooping banner,
And round thee throng and run
The rushes, the green yeomen of thy manor,
The outlaws of the sun.

The burnished dragon-fly is thine attendant,
And tilts against the field,
And down the listed sunbeam rides resplendent
With steel-blue mail and shield.

Thou art the Iris, fair among the fairest,
Who, armed with golden rod
And, winged with the celestial azure, bearest
The message of some God.

Thou art the Muse who, far from crowded cities,
Hauntest the sylvan streams,
Playing on pipes of reeds the artless ditties
That come to us in dreams,

O, Flower-de-luce, bloom on, and let the river
Linger to kiss thy feet!
O, Flower of Song, bloom on, and make forever
The world more fair and sweet.

From the last edition of Praed's Poems, we select the following most graceful and characteristic piece, entitled:

GOOD NIGHT TO THE SEASON.

'So runs the world away.'—Hamlet.

"Good night to the Season! 'Tis over!
Gay dwellings no longer are gay,
The courtier, the gambler, the lover,
Are scattered like swallows away:
There's nobody left to invite one
Except my good uncle and spouse;
My mistress is bathing at Brighton,
My patron is sailing at Cowes;
For want of a better employment,
Till Pouto and Don can get out,
I'll cultivate rural enjoyment
And angle immensely for trout.

* * * * *

Good night to the Season!—the dances,
The fillings of hot little rooms,
The glancings of rapturous glances,
The fancyings of fancy costumes;
The pleasures which fashion makes duties,
The praisings of fiddles and flutes,
The luxury of looking at Beauties,
The tedium of talking to Mutes;
The female diplomatists, planners
Of matches for Laura and Jane;
The ice of her Ladyship's manners,
The ice of his Lordship's champagne.

* * * * *

Good night to the Season!—the Toso
So very majestic and tall;
Miss Ayton, whose singing was so-so,
And Pasta divinest of all;
The labour-in vain of the ballet
So sadly deficient in stars;
The foreigners thronging the Alley,
Inhaling the breath of cigars;
The loge where some heiress (how killing!)
Environed with exquisites sits,
The lovely one out of his drilling,
The silly ones out of their wits.

Good night to the Season!—the splendor
That beamed in the Spanish Bazaar;
Where I purchased—my heart was so tender—
A card-case, a pasteboard guitar,
A bottle of perfume, a girdle,
A lithographed Riego, full-grown,
Whom bigotry drew on a hurdle
That artists might draw him on stone;
A small panorama of Seville,
A trap for demolishing flies
A caricature of the Devil,
And a look from Miss Sheridan's eyes.

Good night to the Season!—the flowers
Of the grand Horticultural Fête,
When boudoirs were quitted for bowers,
And the fashion was—not to be late.
When all who had money and leisure
Grew rural o'er ices and wines,
All pleasantly toiling for pleasure,
All hungrily pining for pines,
And making of beautiful speeches,
And marring of beautiful shows,
And feeding on delicate peaches,
And treading on delicate toes.

Good night to the Season!—Another
Will come with its trifles and toys
And hurry away, like its brother,
In sunshine, in odor, and noise.
Will it come with a rose or a briar?
Will it come with a blessing or curse?
Will its bonnets be lower or higher?
Will its morals be better or worse?
Will it find me grown thinner or fatter,
Or fonder of wrong or of right,
Or married or buried?—no matter;
Good night to the Season!—good night!"

AMUSEMENTS.

Maguire's Opera House.—On Monday evening Arrah-na-Pogue was produced. It proved a good card. This play had such an immense run when it was first presented in this city, its reproduction naturally lead to comparisons between the original cast and the new one. With the single exception of Lady Don, who did not, in spite of her beautiful singing, appear to suit the public taste in the part of "Arrah Meelish," as well as did Mrs. Sedley Brown, the new cast was better than the old one. Lady Don's brogue was entirely too slight for a stage Irish peasant girl, and she lacked in sprightliness of manner, in the first scenes. In the pathetic portions of the play she was far more successful. The "Shaun the Post," of Henry Edwards, was generally pronounced to be an improvement on that presented by Charles Wheatleigh; it was ruder and more boisterous; the brogue more rich and full, and was on the whole, a truer conception of the character than that formed by Mr. Wheatleigh. George Pauncefort assumed his original character of "Colonel Bagenal O'Grady," and played it as well as ever; H. D. Thompson, the original "Michael Feeny," appeared delighted to once more find himself in the part in which he gained so much fame. Pierpont Thayer made all that it was possible to make out of the character of "Beamish M'Coul," and was far ahead of his predecessor in the part. Mrs. Harry Jackson, who can play any part well, made many good points in that of "Fanny Powers." The barn scene was better worked up than before, and the barn-door jig, by "Oiny Farrel," (G. Pardey) and "Katy Welsh," (Miss Emma Miles) was an immense success. Harry Jackson's "Winterbottom" was an inimitable representation of the cockney flunkey, and caused roars of laughter. Great credit is due to Mr. Graves for the perfect manner in which this piece was placed on the stage. The last scene, painted by Torning, was very beautiful. On Friday evening, Arrah-na-Pogue, after having been played to a succession of crowded houses, was withdrawn, and the comedy of the Rivals, and the farce of A Loan of a Lover, were produced on the occasion of the benefit of the British Benevolent Society of California. The cast in the Rivals comprising Lady Don, as "Lydia Languish;" H. Edwards, as "Sir Anthony Absolute;" G. Pauncefort, as "Captain Absolute," and Harry Jackson as "Bob Acres;" we may safely prophesy that the performance was admirable, though unable, in consequence of the Californian going to press at an early hour, to give an account of it.

This afternoon Arrah-na-Pogue will be presented. Monday and Wednesday will be the last two evenings but one on which Lady Don will appear; on Wednesday she will take her farewell benefit. On Thursday the adapation of Le Famille Benoiton, which under the title of The Fast Family, met with such success at Wallack's Theatre, New York, will be produced with an admirable cast. Charles Reade's dramatization of his novel Never too Late to Mend, will probably be produced during next week if the scenery can be prepared in time.

The Sacred Concert—Given at the Metropolitan Theatre last Sunday night was well attended Rossini's Stabat Mater, which constituted the whole second part of the programme, was a very satisfactory performance; and the different solos, concerted pieces and choruses, sung by the Misses Howson, Messrs. Herberte, Wunderlich and Frank Howson, with the assistance of several good male and female voices in the chorus, and accompanied by Prof. Evans and a string quartette, were received with hearty applause. The first part of the programme consisted of the Overture to Zampa, rather badly played (for want of rehearsal, we presume) by the aforesaid string quartette and piano: an Air from the Creation by Frank Howson; an Arietta from Mendelssohn's Elijah, by Miss Clelia Howson; a tenor Air from St. Paul, by Mr. Herberte, with 'cello obligato by F. A. Howson; and Bauer's Ave Maria, by Miss Emma Howson, with violin obligato by John Howson. We are glad to record a perceptible improvement in the performances of this talented family, and especially in those of the two young ladies, since their arrival here; and we shall watch their progress in music with increasing interest. We have left till the last any mention of what was to many the most attractive part of the programme—the violin and piano performances of M. and Mme. Joseph Heine, consisting of Beethoven's Adagio in F and Paganini's variations (for one string) on the Prayer from Moses in Egypt; also, in response to an encore, Vieuxtemp's Variations, for violin without accompaniment, on "Days of Absence;" all rendered with the fine artistic feeling and perfect execution which we have noticed on previous occasions, although we think M. Heine was troubled with strings of inferior quality, and perhaps also affected, in his delicate organization, by the want of musical sympathy in the audience. Such music as that of M. and Mme. Heine can only be given in perfection to an audience thoroughly genial and appreciative, and we fear it will be a long time before such an audience will be a large one in this city. A small but handsome and comfortable hall, where chamber music could be given without great expense, to those who really love it, is a great desideratum; the new Mercantile Library Building will contain a hall of this description, but it will not be completed for several months; meantime Music must wait.

The second Sacred Concert of M. and Mme. Heine, will be given at the Metropolitan Theatre to-morrow evening. To hear M. Heine's performance of intricate pieces of music is a treat seldom vouchsafed to our citizens. The perfection of his harmonies is wonderful. The programme offered is a rich one. Some of the most brilliant gems among the works of the old masters will be produced. Want of space prevents us from expatiating on the excellence of the entertainment offered. Henri Herberte, the most popular tenor in the State. has been engaged, and will sing Rossini's "Cujus Amina," and other solos.

The Academy of Music.—The Japanese gymnasts, who have just left us, delighted thousands. No sooner have they departed, than the Imperial Troupe of Japanese Conjurors make their appearance. It was universally confessed that the gymnastic feats of the troupe, now in Sacramento, surpassed any ever before performed in this country. Now we are promised, in addition to still more astonishing gymnastic feats, a series of mysterious conjuroring feats, which might puzzle Mosses himself. As the stay of these, the original artistes, is to be limited to three days, it is safe to prophesy that on Monday, Tuesday and Weduesday evenings, the Academy will be thronged.

The Alamania Masquerade Ball—This association will give its second Annual Subscription Masquerade, at Platt's Hall, on the evening of Saturday, January 19th instant. The names of the Committee, from whom only tickets can be obtained, are published in their announcement in our paper. Their first entertainment, last year, at the Academy of Music, was the most recherché affair of the season. The Tornings have been called into requisition to decorate the Hall, at the expenditure of $1,000; two bands of music have been engaged; and, like their last ball, the coming one of the Alamania Association, will certainly be the sensation of the season.

The Social Entertainment of the B'nia Berith association, in aid of the fund of the Ladies' United Hebrew Benevolent Society, is to take place on Tuesday evening, January 15th instant, at Platt's Hall. It will be remembered that the Society gave an entertainment some two months ago, at which they performed Black Eyed Susan very effectively, followed by one of the best social entertainments of the season; the proceeds of which was devoted to the cause of benevoleuce.

Turn Verein.—This association inaugurated their new Hall on O'Farrell street, with a New Year's Festival. Their gymnastic performances showed great nerve, strength and proficiency, and elicited frequent applause. At the conclusion of these exercises dancing followed until a late hour. The entertainment was a very sociable and enjoyable one.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 13.

"Medicine Chests always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

The Allopathic system of medicine is a system of cunning, fraud and crime. Dr. Bourne has so stigmatized it during twenty-five years or more. Cunning, because it is so devised that the fraud which it perpetrates has for ages obscured the intellect of those whom it oppresses. A fraud, because while it professes to be a good and to bless mankind has been its most grievous curse. A crime, because in the darkening catalogue of human woes, it stands prominent for its butcheries by lancet, leech and poison. George Washington was bled to death. So was Gen. Taylor. Gen. Harrison was sacrificed. So also Lord Byron, a bitter enemy to medical practice. Bulwer would have shared the same fate but for a fortunately acquired knowledge of Water-Cure. Dr. J. Kearney Rodgers, of New York was fairly butchered a few years since, through culpable ignorance of his medical attendants, and the list might be extended through all ages and among all mankiud.

The character of the ageuts employed by medical practitioners also deserves a thorough notice, more extended than my space will permit.

Webster defines Poison as "auy agent capable of producing a morbid, noxious, or dangerous effect upon anything endowed with life. All medicines possessing sufficient activity to be of much value, are always poisons in inordinate or excessive quantities; and everything poisonous is capable of proving medicinal, in suitably reduced quantities. The ancient Greeks employed the same word both for a medicine and a poison."

In Hooper's Medical Lexicon you may read: "All the metallic preparations are uncertain, as it depends entirely upon the state of the stomach whether they have no action at all, or operate with dangerous violence."

The learned Dr. Cheue writes: "Minerals are the most destructive to animal bodies that malice can invent; beyond gunpowder or even spirituous liquors, for not only nature has provided none such, but as poisons in venomous creatures, to kill their enemies. They become iron bristles, nails and lancet, darting perpendicularly into the solids of the body, so as quickly to tear, rend and destroy; and can therefore never be proper for food or physic. Whereas galvanical or vegetable productions have none of these bad properties, and are, consequently, designed both for food and the sick."

The list of poisons in use by the Allopathic Physician, embraces every known poison. Air, earth and water have been ransacked to furnish everything odious, nauseous, filthy and destructive, and the practice partakes of this quality of their medicines.

To the Sick.—Cures without medicines, and in almost all cases guaranteed, if so agreed, for a stipulated fee; and that does not mean patchwork. Twenty-five years of observation and active experience enables Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, to offer the sick the above desirable terms.

AN OCEAN WAIF.

IN EIGHT CHAPTERS.

[Concluded from last week's paper.]

[The clipper ship Southern Star, from Sydney to Liverpool, with a few passengers, and a large shipment of Government gold, is taken possession of by mutineers in the night—headedby Hicks and Phillips and three other passengers and second by a number of confederates who had shipped as a portion of the crew—for the purpose of securing the gold on board. The Captain, Mates, and two sailors are killed and thrown overboard. Major Horton—who is also killed in the melee—and his two daughters were the only other passengers. John Cross, a sailor on the ship and the narrater of this story, while defending his officers, recieves a cutlas wound on the head which renders him insensible. He is thrown overboard, but revives on striking the water and swims to the rudder chains for support; where he remains secreted from view all day. The other sailors are sent off in a boat, but the two Misses Horton are retained on board by the mutineers. As night comes on Cross makes himself known to the young ladies in their state-room over his head.]

"WHO spoke?" I heard from above me.

"Hush!" I whispered, leaning out as far as I could,—"hush! it is me,—John Cross."

"Pray—pray, save us! For heaven's sake, help!"

"Yes, yes!" I said; "but speak low, or we shall be heard.—Miss Mary?"

"Yes," cried the voice, eagerly.

"Is there a rope of any kind there?"

There was silence for a minute, and then she said, "No!"

"Are you listening?" I said.

"Yes, she whispered.

"Then take the sheets from the cots, and tie them tightly together, and then fasten one end to the table; tightly, mind."

I waited while I could hear her busily toiling, but in a few moments, the voice whispered despairingly, "I can never tie them tightly enough."

"Never mind," I said; "only tie them, all you can find, together, and lower them down."

Soon after, something white was lowered from the cabin window, and hung down, swuying backwards and forwards; and at last, after many tries, I reached it. More and more came down, till there was far more than I wanted, when I made the knots fast, and whispered to her to draw up. "Now," I said, "as soon as it is tight, twist all you have round the table-leg, and hold on."

In a few minutes, I found the sheet-rope would bear my weight, and directly after, I was holding on by the cabin-window, with those two poor girls clinging, crying, to me, and begging me to save them.

I felt most mad, as I looked at them by the light of the cabin lantern. Hair torn down; dresses half dragged from their shoulders; while, right across the face of Miss Mary was a mark as of a blow, while her poor lip was cut and bleeding.

"O, pray—pray, save us!" she cried, putting her poor hand on mine, as I clung there.

"As I hope God may save me," I said; "or I'll die for you."

And then there was silence for a few moments; and if I had dared, I should have kissed the soft hand that nestled against mine so trustingly, but I thought it would be cowardly, and I did not.

"And now," I whispered, "I'm going on deck."

"Ah! don,t leave us," sobbed Miss Madeline.

"It is to try what I can do to get you away," I whispered; and then the poor girl, who seemed half fainting, sank down, kneeling on the floor, and her sister leaned over her, and said to me, "We'll pray for you, Cross."

"Then I shall succeed,' I said, for I felt that I should; and so I left them, feeling nerved to have done anything in their defence.

I soon was over the poop, and crawling close under the bulwarks, when I found that the man by the binnacle-light was fast asleep, for the ship made no way at all. I stopped in the darkness for a few minutes, listening. and could hear voices in the fore-cabin; and it was evident there was a good deal of drunkenness and carousing going forward. Half a dozen staunch, well-armed fellows could have secured the ship, I felt sure, as I opened my knife that hung by a lanyard to my waist, and then shoving it open in my belt, I crawled to the skylight, and looked down into the passengers' cabin, where I could see Hicks, Phillips, and two more playing cards, while, another lay on the bulkhead asleep. It was a good thing I had no pistol in my hand, or I should have had that Hicks' blood upon my head then.

I crept away from the skylight and under the bulwarks again, though it was as dark as pitch, and began making my way towards the other boat as hung from the davits; when all at once, some one had me by the throat, and tried to turn me on my back: but I was too quick, for I had my knife against his ribs in a moment, and hissed out, "You're a dead man if you stir."

That was sharp practice, for we were both on our knees close against the bulwarks, and I could feel his hot breath right in my face, as he must have felt mine. Just then, he gave a bit of a shift, and my knife pricked him, for I meant what I said then; but the prick made him start so that he got a got the better of me, and had tight hold of my hand which held the knife.

"Now, you murdering, piratical scoundrel," he hissed between his teeth; and I began to feel that if I didn't look sharp I should have the worst of it. "Now, give up the knife, you dog, or I'll strangle yon, if it's only for poor Jack's sake."

"Hullo!" I says in a whisper, slackening my hold.

"Hullo!" he says in a whisper, slackening his hold.

"What, Tom, matey!" I says.

"What, Jack, old lad!" he says; and I'm blessed if we didn't hug each other like two great gals.

"Why, I thought they knocked you on the head," I says.

"Why, I see them pitch you overboard," he says.

"Yes," I says: "but I got on the rudder-chains."

"Ah!" he says; "and in the tussle I was knocked down; but I got down below after, and got in that empty water-cask. I ain't been out a quarter of an hour."

"Who's on deck?" I says.

"Only that chap at the wheel," he says, "for I've been all round."

And then we had a whisper together for five minutes, which ended in our creeping up to where the boat hung.

"There's water in her," says Tom.

"And there's safe to be some biscuit in the locker," I says.

"But," says Tom, "hadn't we better stop and hide? We shall be starved."

"Tom, mate," I says; and then I whispered to him about what I'd heard and what I'd seen, when he stopped me.

"Hold hard, mate," he says; "just see if the boat-hook and the oars are in. I'm with you."

Everything was in its place; and then cautiously we let go the falls, and began slowly to lower down the boat, meaning to fasten the lines at last, and slide down. The blocks ran easy enough, but on such a silent night, do what we could, there was some noise; and at last one of the shieves gave such a chirrup, that the noise in the cabin stopped, and we stopped too; and directly after, some one came up the cabin stairs, and on deck; and as we cowered close together under the bulwarks, holding on to the ropes, and trembling lest we should let them slip ever so little, Hicks—for I knew his step—walked close by us right forward, and then back on the other side, where he kicked the man by the wheel savagely, and spoke to him once or twice, but there was no answer, and then muttering to himself, he went below again.

"That was close," said Tom, for he had almost brushed against us; and then we each took a long breath, and, amidst a good deal of noisy talk, the boat kissed the water, and we lashed our ropes fast.

"Now, if we only had some more prog," said Tom, "I wouldn't care."

"Don't stop, mate," I says; "there's lines in the locker, and p'raps they've something in the cabin."

"All right, says Tom; und he slid over the side, and was in the boat in a moment; but not without rattling one of the oars, and I trembled again for fear he should have been heard. But all was quiet, and the next moment I was beside him: and as we couldn't unhook the boat, I cut the ropes fore and aft, and then Tom slowly worked her along and under the cabin window where those demons were sitting; then past the window of the captain's cabin, round the rudder, and then there was a joyful cry, for I had fast hold of the sheets hanging down.

"Make her fast with the painter, Tom," I said; and up I went, and next minute stood between those two poor creatures, both of them clinging to me in that sad way—it was pitiful.

"Hush!" I said—"not a sound;" and then drawing up the sheet, I just looked at the knots, and made it fast round Miss Madeline, for Miss Mary would not go first. Poor girl, she tried all she could to help me; and so, she creeping out herself, I lowered Miss Madeline down into the boat, and the shaken sheet told me all was right.

"God bless you for this," whispered Miss Mary, as I made the sheet-rope fast round her. "Be kind to us, for we are in your hands."

I didn't say anything, but I did kneel down and kiss her hand that time. She was a deal more active than her sister; and in another minute, I had her lowered down into the boat, and Tom cast off the sheet.

"Shy down some blankets," he whispered; and I dragged those out that were in the cots, and threw them down, and the pillows too. On the table were biscuit, cheese, meat, and cake, and these I slipped into a pillow-case, and lowered down. In the lockers, too, were biscuit tins, and two wicker-covered bottles; and these I lowered down, for I felt safe now, knowing how soon I could slip down, and that the ladies were out of danger; for I knew, if discovered, pursuit would be vain in the dark. So, as fast as I could, I lowered down cases of preserved meat, and wine, and everything of use that I could find in the lockers, when, giving a glance round, I thought, now I'll go. I thought the sheet-rope might come in, though, as an awning, so I stooped down to untie it, meaning to slip it round the leg after, and slide down with it double. so that I could then loose one end, and draw it after me. It was hard work, though, for the knots had been strained; and I kneeled at last, and tried my teeth; but they were no good; and I pulled my knife out of my belt, cut the knot, drew up enough so as it should give double, and was passing it round the leg, when I heard a noise, started up, and leaped on one side, just as Hicks stood in the door, and fired at me. He had lowered his revolver to cock for another shot, but he had not time, for I was on him in an instant, with my knife driven deep into his throat and chest; and then, as he fell with a wild gurgling cry, I wrenched out the knife, dragged to the floor, and was out of the window, just as Tom was climbing up by means of the boat-hook, for he could not reach the sheet.

"Back," I says,—"back quickly, and cast off the painter; and while he was getting out of my way, I had time enough to see Hicks give two or three clutches at the carpet, and then lie still. The moment after, I was in the boat, and with one tremendous shove, sent her yards away from the ship, as it were into a thick bank of darkness.

"Lie down," I whispered to the ladies; and Madeline crept to her sister's feet, while Tom and I got out the oars, and as quickly as possible paddled away, not daring to make a sound, for there was a noise on board, and three or four shots were fired at random out of the cabin window. Then we could see them on deck, and some one fired a pistol off again; but the bullets never came near us.

"They're going to try and launch a boat, I expect," said Tom with a chuckle; "and there's the dingey, as 'll hold two comfortably; and as for the long-boat, I don't think they'll get her over the side to-night."

"Pray — pray, row fast," cried Miss Mary. "Can't we help?" and she moved forward as if to get to an oar.

"God bless you, no, miss!" I said in a whisper; "we'll bend to it directly." And then we paddled a little farther off, till I thought they couldn't hear the oars in the rowlocks, when we both bent to it, and rowed stroke for stroke for a good hour, and all on right through the thickest darkness I ever saw, and long after the lights in the cabin window of the good ship Southern Star had disappeared.

All at once Tom stopped, and threw in his oar.

"What is it?" I says.

"Matey," he says, "I haven't had bit nor sup since tea last night; and I think we shall work better after somethin'."

I hadn't thought of it before; but I knew how weak I felt, and so I pulled in my oar too, and Tom pulled up one of the biscuit-tins, and found the cheese and a bottle.

"Lend me your knife, Jack," he says, and my hand went naturally enough to my belt; but the moment after I shuddered, and told him to break the cheese, pretending I could not get at it.

Just as we pushed off, I could see by the cabin lights that Miss Madeline had crept down at her sister's feet; but I found they were sitting side by side; so I got one of the blankets over them, and then, after a deal of persuading, managed to get them to take some of the biscuit and cheese, and some wine. Tom and I took a sup each, and put our biscuit and cheese on the seat by us, and made ready for a start again, eating as we went on, and then rowing as true as we could, so as to keep the boat's head the same way; and without any more stoppage, for we knew what trouble those poor gals were in, starting as they were at every splash we laid down to our work, and rowed on, hour after hour, right away into the thick darkness.

CHAPTER V.

I suppose it must have been the Devil put it into my head, for while I was busy lowering things down into the boat, I thought how easy it would be to get upsides with the murdering party as were in the ship. I'd only got to turn over the cabin lantern, and she'd soon have been in a blaze, when they would have had enough to do to save themselves, and the treasure must have gone to the bottom. But I shouldn't have done such a thing, and in another minute I should have been helping to shove off the boat, if that Hicks hadn't rushed on to his death; that was a terrible thing to think on, not but that he deserved it richly, and I knew what I did was in self-defence, and for the sake of them two poor gals.

I should say it was about twelve o'clock when we laid to at it, and rowed straight off right away into the thick darkness, with not a sound to be heard but the "lap, lap, lapping" of the water against the boat's stem, and the splash and rattle of our oars. There wasn't a word spoken, for we wanted all our breath, and knew well enough that all depended on our being well out of sight of the ship when day broke; and of course they would be sweeping the offing with a glass. What I was most afraid of was, that we might get rowing in a circle, and not get far enough off, when we knew what would be the end of it if they once caught sight of us. It quite made me give a shudder and lay back at my oar, till Tom said "Steady!" when steady it was again.

There seemed something awful and solemn about that night: what with the horrors we had been through, and one thing and another, I felt quite outer sorts; and the still darkness we were driving through, far out there in the midst of the great ocean, seemed to hang heavy-like upon me, so that I did not care to speak. A regular, long, steady pull, hour after hour, and all that while not a star to be seen, while I could barely distinguish my mate Tom when I looked over my shoulder, for there wasn't a breath of wind stirring. At last the pull began to tell upon us both, so that we were glad to take another sup apiece of the wine; but that did not take us long, and we were off and away again faster than ever.

By and by the clouds began to tinge, and we then knew what we didn't know before, that we were pulling due north; and then, almost all at once, up came the sun, and shone upon them two poor things fast asleep,—worn out, as they sat in the bottom of the boat, with their arms tight round one another, and their poor faces that pale and bad, it was pitiful. Up came the sun higher, and there was the sea heaving gently and curling over, and all glowing with the most beautiful colors. But we had no thought for the glowing morning, for there was something else to take our attention,—there lay the ship plainly to be seen in the distance, and I knew if a breeze sprung up, she must soon overhaul us. If the darkness had only kept on, I shouldn't have cared, but there it was, a bright, glowing morning; and I knew, if they looked out for us they must see us; our only hope being that, half drunk overnight, they might be hours yet before they roused up; and then, dispirited with the loss of their head man, they mightu't care about pursuit.

"Wash your face, Jack," says Tom in a whisper, as we lay to, looking at the ship, now standing out quite plain on the horizon,—"wash your face and hands, mate."

I looked at my hands, and gave a shudder, for they were all over blood, while I suppose my face was in the same state, and it wasn't from the cut as I had on my head. So I leaned over the side, and had a good dip in the cool, pleasant water; and while I was drying myself on my handkercher, Miss Mary gave a sigh, and opened her eyes, and looked at me as if she didn't know where she was, nor anything about it; but, directly after, the color began to come into her cheeks, and she reached over her hand to me, and I kissed it; and then she reached her hand over to Tom, and he did the same; and of course we did it roughly, but Miss Mary seemed to know what we meant, and she gave us a sweet, sad smile, and then kissed her sister, and woke her.

We were dead beat, both us, Tom and I; but I gave a look at the poor old Star, and so did Tom, and we quite understood one another, and rowed on with a quiet, steady stroke, for we were too tired to make a spurt. I got the ladies to sit down in the bottom of the boat, so as to show as little as we could, and then we kept on till they begged of us to stop and have something by way of breakfast. You see Miss Mary had ranged the pillows and blankets, and made a place for her sister to lie down, for the poor gal was so ill she could hardly hold up her head; and then she had stowed the stores about a bit handy, and made things straight, in a way just as if she hadn't been a delicate lady as had never known trouble before. And now, as I said afore, she and her sister begged of us to stop and have some breakfast.

But we couldn't do it. I knew that every yard now was as good as a mile by and by, and though I felt ready to drop, it was pull steady, though we had a freshener as we went on.

I didn't think as they knew the ship was in sight, for nothing was said about it; but as she was passing a cup of wine over to Tom, Miss Mary leaned her hand upon my shoulder, and whispered: "Don't let my sister know that the ship is in sight."

How that poor girl did work to cheer up the other, as she lay there; and to have looked at her, you would not have thought she had a trouble upon her, for she had a cheerful word for us all; and as I dragged away there at my oar, it seemed to me that we must have got an angel in the boat.

I did not want to make any more show than I could help, or I would have soon made an awning over where the ladies sat; but as the day wore on, we laid a blanket across an oar, and sheltered Miss Madeline, for the sun came down fierce. I could have hoisted the sail, too, and let the light breeze which now just touched us, give us a help along; but I darn't; and I'd just taken hold of my oar again, when I saw that the Star had some sails shook out, and was making towards us head on.

I couldn't help it: if my life had been at stake, that groan must have come; and just then there was another behind me. I turned sharp round just as Tom's oar hit me in the back, and there was the poor fellow swooned right away.

I laid the oars in, and Mary came and helped me, when between us we got him laid in the bottom of the boat; and then, while putting him comfortable, I found what I didn't know before—that his head was regularly laid open, and there had he been working till he dropped, without saying a single word, or giving a groan. We bathed it, and tore up one of the sheets, and tied it up; and after a bit, he seemed to come to a little, but it was only to talk wildly, and throw his arms about, and stare. So when we had done all we could for the poor fellow, we made a sort of shelter over him; and then, as I was shading his eyes, and looking out toward the Star, to see what way she made, I found as I couldn't see her, and that things looked swimming and misty-like, and then back I went across the thwarts, as if struck down. But I wasn't long so, for I soon came to; and as I did so, and the horrible, deathly sick feeling went off, I felt the blood come up in my face with a rush, for there was Mary bending over me, and those soft, white hands were bathing my face; while twice over there was a tender, pitying tear fell upon my cheek.

"Poor fellows! what you have suffered for us," she said, as I got up.

"It was that crack on the head, you see, miss," I said.

"What! were you wounded, too?" she exclaimed.

"O, not much," I said; "not much, miss. One of those blackguards knocked me down in the scuffle. But," I said, trying to put a good face on the matter, though I could not help feeling better as I said it—but, I'm only a common, thick-headed sailor."

"Hush!" she said, with such a quiet, dignified way as she could put on when she liked—"hush! Don't speak like that, when you have acted so nobly, so heroically, and—and—may God bless you for it!" And here her voice seemed to break down, and she turned away her head for a minute; but directly after, she was quiet, and still, and reserved again, and tearing up some more of the sheet, as if to make bandages.

"Let me look at your head," she says all at once; and though I was against it, and didn't want he to, she would examine it; and cut away the hair with a tiny pair of scissors, and then bathed it, and bound it up; and I suppose it was a bad cut, for if I didn't go right off again just as she'd bound it up, and only came to feeling sick and done up, and without a bit of life in me hardly. After mid-day the sun came down fiercer and fiercer, so that we were all soon parched with thirst, and glad of the water, as there was fortunately a good drop of; and Mary wetted our lips for us from time to time, for after about an hour I gave up, and was obliged to lie still.

And all this time the ship came slowly nearer, and Mary told me from time to time as I asked her, and she did it, too, without moving a muscle; and at last, toward evening, when we knew they must see us as they came slowly on, Mary kneeled down by me to put the bandage more comfortable, and then whispered to me, with her face and lips, too, quite white: "Was any one killed last night when you escaped?"

I couldn't do anything else, and so I said—"yes."

"Who was it?" she said again in a voice that didn't seem to belong to her.

"It was his own fault," I said: "it was to save my own life."

"Was it that fiend who shot poor papa?" she whispered.

"Yes," I said; and then she closed her eyes for a bit, and did not speak; but after a time she leaned closer to me, so that I could feel her breath upon my face, and then she whispered; "We shall be taken again, shall we not?"

I could not answer, but I knew that if the wind freshened ever so little they would be alongside us by dark. But she wanted no answer, for she read it all in my face.

"God bless you, brave, noble man!" she said; "then we must join poor papa;" and then she seemed as if she would say something more, but did not speak for perhaps half an hour; when, as the wind freshened a little, and the ship came nearer to us, she spoke again in a whisper.

"You know, if we are taken, what is in store for us; and I suppose," she said mourufully, "they will not be merciful to you."

I gave my head a shake.

"Then," she said, with quite a smile on her beautiful lips, "I want you to promise, on your oath as a man, that we shall not—poor sister and me—fall alive into the hands of those monsters."

"What do you mean?" I says, feeling all of a tremble, and with the sweat standing on my forehead. "What do you mean?"

"For God's sake—for the sake of your own mother—by all you hold dear and holy," she whispered, "kill us both."

"I couldn't—I couldn't," I groaned.

"Would you sooner see me do it?" she said, quietly.

I could not speak, for I felt choking. I could do nothing but gaze in a wild sort of way at the beautiful creature who was talking so calmly and patiently of death.

"There is no mercy from those monsters," she said,—"so promise;" and she took both my hands, and I promised; for the blood seemed to rush through my veins again as she held my hands, and I thought of the cries and prayers I heard as I hung on by the rudder-chains, and then I felt that I should sooner clasp her in my arms, and plunge overboard, than that one of those ruffians should ever again lay a finger upon her.

"I swear it," I says; and then, with a choky, husky voice I says: "And you'll forgive me?"

"Yes," she says; "and pray for you. And now I feel calm."

On came the ship, with the wind freshening every minute, so that our little boat began to dance a little on the waves The sun sunk down lower and lower, and the cool breeze seemed quite to revive me, so that I sat up, and then helped Miss Madeline to sit up as well; when, with poor Tom fast asleep, I sat down in the stern-sheets waiting for the end, with those well-born ladies, one on each side, clasping my hands, and trusting to me to save them, but not from death. In the calm of that golden, glorious evening there was more then one prayer said aloud by a sweet and touching voice, as I sat thinking how hard it was to die so young; and there we sat, with the vessel coming nearer and nearer, but not to touch our boat, for with the boat-hook near at hand I was ready to drive out a plank or two when I saw it was time; and there we sat waiting for the end.

CHAPTER VI.

"Another quarter of an hour, and then death," I muttered as I thought to myself; but they both heard it, and Miss Mary looked up in my face with so sweet and heavenly a smile as she said: "Yes, dear friend; and rest where there is no more sin and suffering, no more pain and sorrow. But a little while, and we shall be at peace."

It was not for such as me to answer her; but her sweet calmness seemed to nerve my arm, and as the ship came nearer and nearer, I drew the boat-hook closer to my hand, and laid it across the boat. The sun was now just dipping, and, roused and excited as I felt then, it seemed to me that the broad red path which stretched along the waves would be the one we should take; and certain as death then seemed, I don't know that I felt to dread it so very much, for there was so much pity, so much sorrow for the young and beautiful girls by my side.

"Very soon now," said Miss Mary; and with a wild, strange look, she laid her hand upon my knife, which stuck in my belt, and taking it, tried, with her tender fingers, to open the great blade, while her sister, seeing the movement, covered her face with her hands, and slipped fainting off the seat.

"Poor Maddy! good-by!" said Miss Mary, kneeling by her, and kissing her pale face; and then she glanced at the ship, and then fixed her eyes on mine as I held the great open-bladed knife in my hand. "I will not flinch," she whispered.

"Not with this," I said hoarsely; "it's stained with his foul blood;" and cutting the lanyard which held it, I threw it overboard. "No," I says, "I could not do that; we'll go down together."

As I looked at her, I remembered some words I had read in the Testement about seeing Stephen's face shine like the face of an angel. I've said that hers was an angel's face, but if I had thought so before, how much more did it seem so now, in its sad, mournful beauty, with her bright golden hair hanging down loose, and the deep glow from the setting sun, half beneath the water, full upon her; and the sight of this made me hesitate, for it seemed impossible that man could wrong one so beautiful; and though my hand was stretched out to take hold of the boat-hook; when she saw what was passing, and whispered, "Your promise!" and then I called up those dreadful cries again; seized the boat-hook, and stood up, watching the bearing down of the ship, with the water foaming beneath her bows, and the golden sunlight seeming to creep up her masts till all below was in shadow; and nearer and nearer she came, as though to run us down.

I gave one look at Miss Mary, whose eyes were now closed; and with clasped hands, and a sweet smile playing on her lips, she kneeled by her sister, waiting for the end, now so near.

And nearer and nearer still came the ship in the gathering shadows, for we were where there was no twilight, but a quick change from day to night. I could see plainly the faces on board, and see that preparations were being made for shortening sail. They saw me standing up with the boat-hook, and, I suppose, thought I meant to hook on when they brought up, but, in another minute, it would have gone through the bottom of the boat with a crash. I looked towards poor Tom, who lay asleep; Miss Mary was still on her knees, beside her fainting sister: and I felt that the moment had come; when, with a prayer for mercy—one learned years upon years before, and which now came rushing to my lips—I raised the pole. The ship would pass within a few yards of us; but it was almost dark already, and as she came dashing down, the breeze seemed to freshen as if by magic; and as the old Star swept by, my arm sank to my side, and I fell on my knees in the boat, muttering: "Saved, saved!" and then I laughed, for I knew what our old ship was and that she would shoot by far enough before they could bring her to under their clumsy management, and I knew it would be night, for even now it was dark.

The change from despair to hope was so sudden and stunning; but a hand laid upon my arm roused me, and I explained how it all was, and that there was yet a chance of life. Then I set to and considered a little, and tried to think what was best to do; but for a bit my brain was all in a whirl, and I could do nothing.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 5, 1867.

THE ETHICS, AND ÆSTHETICS OF PUBLIC DINNERS.

A DINNER was given in this city on New Year's Eve "in commemoration of the opening of direct steam navigation with China and Japan," which was so badly managed, and proved to be such a heavy affair, that it gives rise to some considerations relating to the morals and fine arts of public dinners. Manners, say the French, are minor morals; in this case the subject matter also belongs to the fine-arts, and we shall therefore treat it both ethically and æsthetically under one head.

In point of morals, and also of the fine-arts, such an entertainment should be what it promised to be when the subscribers paid for their tickets, a social dinner, served at the appointed time, promptly dispatched, and devoted to the purpose announced in the programme. In point of fail, the dinner in question was not served until three-quarters of an hour after the time appointed, when all the guests were over-hungry, and excessively fatigued from having cooled themselves for an hour in the corridor of the hotel; and then the courses were dispatched so slowly that they did not keep pace with the appetite of the guests, and needlessly delayed the commencement of the speaking for a good half-hour; and, finally, the whole entertainment was perverted into an immense puffardo of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. When it was arranged that the local Superintendent of that Company in answer to a complimentary toast, should call to the floor of his successor the attorney of the Company, who should consume a good half-hour in lauding the Company, and putting in a plea for its release from its engagements, then it follows that one of two things is true, either that the committee of arrangements provided an annoyance for their guests by consenting beforehand to this programme, or that the Company committed a breach of propriety both upon the committee and upon the assembly. We appreciate the eloquent ability of their counsel, we would advocate the cause of the Company itself, and are in favor of the Sandwich Islands being left out of their route to China, but, in the name of the Prophet, let us have some propriety even in public dinners. Instead of the Company's resolving 250 guests at a public banquet into a grand jury paying $13 a head as jury fees, let that corporation get up a dinner to itself, and send around free tickets, and then we will be bound that the guests will be patient, and bring in a verdict of acquittal if the Company puts itself on trial before them. When guests, even at a public dinner are annoyed, they will vent their annoyance in some manner.

"Four hundred and seventy-five thousand passengers transported by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company!" said the celebrated Mr. Colborne, who was present, "at ten dollars a head, that is four millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars; at $100 per head it is forty-seven millions five hundred thousand dollars; at $133 per head, it is sixty-two millions; add about half as much more for freight, it is ONE HUNDRED MILLIONS secured by the Company for passengers and freight in nineteen years, which is tolerably fair pay, and shows why its stock is quoted at 172 in New York." But, as we said before, we are in favor of the Company, and are ready to dead-head its dinners and even its passenger tickets on all suitable occasions.

ALother fatal defect in the entertainment was the number and the character of the pre-arranged speeches. Seventeen toasts on such an occasion was a deadly number, too many by half. No one seems to have had the right or the courage to say to the distinguished speakers, "we wish you to confine yourself to ten minutes," but on they all went and discoursed generally for a full half hour, and it was consequently half past two before they got through. Good speeches, all of them, in their way, but somehow it seemed as if each one had written out his speech and memorized it, and that some one had taken the manuscript and given it to some daily paper in whose office it was already in print for publication the next morning. A speaker under such circumstances cannot speak naturally or appropriately. He resembles one strapped to the bed of Procroustes, his scalp touching the head rail, and his heels the foot rail; he cannot depart from his written speech, nor can he take advantage of those incidents which grow out of the assembly itself, and which, and only which, give life, sparkle and zest to the entertainment. There was but one of the regular speeches which appeared free from this evident constraint, and that was Mr. Barnes', which seemed to come up spontaneously from the incidents of the evening, like the sparkling bubbles on the surface of an effervescing spring; evidently not written out or memorized; and, very remarkably, not reported at all in the Alta of next morning!

The æsthetics of public dinners demand that after the heavy ordinance of the opening by the President, to whom is assigned the duty of giving all the statistics of the occasion, and which duty was in this instance discharged with great taste and propriety by Gov. Low, the rest of the speeches should be short, pungent, to the point, and humorous, in a degree, in reference to the events of the evening. Long speeches, and memorized discourses are out of place; like stale champaign they do not exhilarate, but merely stupify. What will our New York friends think when they read all those long discourses as specimens of the lively wit and humor of a San Francisco gathering in honor of one of the greatest wants of the age? What will they say when they learn that almost all those speeches were memorized, and many of them read from manuscript? What will be their surprise to learn that absolutely no opportunity was given for any volunteer toasts, or to call out the celebrities present who were not down on the programme, but, that after the regular toasts were through, the solemn orators of the occasion solemnly retired with the body of the assembly, leaving His Excellency the Governor presiding, and wholly unsupported except by a single attendant who "stood by him to the last."

There is another matter belonging to the fine-arts of public dinners which it is worth while to know. Gentlemen are expected not to get drunk at table in the early part of the evening; nor to call for the President by his surname before the dinner is fairly served; nor is it quite en regle to interrupt the programme by calls for favorite speakers, before the regular toasts have been duly dispatched; in fine, perhaps it would "pay" to send a special agent to New York or some other great city, to learn how to conduct a public dinner in a Metropolitan fashion. One might study the matter and name of the speech delivered by Mr. A. A. Low, of New York, on the occasion, with great profit.

It is needless to say that Gov. Low, although subjected to many annoyances, presided with great dignity and grace, and was wanting in no respect to the occasion.

AN EXPLANATION.

THE New York Weekly Review makes the following explanation of the appearance in that paper of a number of Mr. Stoddard's poems, written for, and originally published in the CALIFORNIAN, with the heading "Written for the Weekly Review." The San Francisco CALIFORNIAN says:

"'My Friend,' a poem by Charles Warren Stoddard, originally written for THE CALIFORNIAN, and published in it several months since, appears in the number of the New York Weekly Review of September 15th, as a contribution for that paper. This is not the first instance in which poems of Mr. Stoddard, which first appeared in THE CALIFORNIAN, have been republished as 'original' in the Review. We are quite at a loss as to the explanation of such a proceeding."

The explanation is simple, and we trust it will prove satisfactory. The two or three of Mr. Charles Warren Stoddard's poems that have appeared in the Review were sent to us, in their author's manuscript, by one of his friends in this city, with the intimation that Mr. Stoddard would like to have them published. We printed them, therefore, as contributions, not knowing that they had ever been published elsewhere. No person is in fault for a natural misunderstanding.

Inasmuch as Mr. Stoddard never sent the manuscript of these poems to New York, or entrusted it to any person for that purpose, or intimated to any person his wish to have the poems published in the Review, the "explanation" however "simple," still leaves a little mystery behind it. However, as Mr. Toots says, "It's of no consequence."

EDUCATION TO BE ADAPTED TO THE INDIVIDUAL.—The great secret of education is to develope the faculties of an individual; for it may happen that his real talents may be hidden and buried under his education. A decided character, however, is repugnant to a particular pursuit, yet delighting in another; an indifferent lawyer might be an admirable architect. At present all our human bullion is sent to be melted down in a university, to come out, as if thrown into a burning mould, a bright physician, a bright lawyer, a bright devine; in other words, to adapt themselves for a profession, preconcerted by their parent. By this means we may secure a titular profession for our son; but the true genius of the avocation, the bent of the mind, as a man of great original powers called it, is too often absent. Instead of finding fit offices for fit men, we are perpetually discovering on the stage of society, actors out of character

OUR NEW POSTAL AGENT.—Mr. B. C. Truman, who recently arrived overland to assume his duties as Special Postal Agent for this coast, was formerly the war correspondent of the New York Times, and was at one time a member of the staff of Andrew Johnson when he was Military Governor of Tennessee. His present position is only a change from staff to post, that is all.

A CRITICAL NOTICE OF CHARLES DICKENS' CHRISTMAS STORY MUGBY JUNCTION.

THANKS to the enterprise of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields, the well known Boston publishers of Charles Dickens' Christmas Number of Household Words, was published in America seven days prior to its appearance in England. "Mugby Junction" occupies one entire number of Every Saturday. A larger proportion of this Christmas story than is usually the case, is from the pen of Charles Dickens, he having in addition to the introduction story, written two sketches: "The Boy at Mugby" and "The Signal-man." Roads diverged in seven directions from Mugby Junction. One stormy night a traveler, on whose luggage is painted "Barbox Brothers," arrives at the junction and gets out of the train instead of pursuing his journey further. A brief soliloquy makes the reader acquainted with the history of Barbox Brothers, or rather that of the sole representative of the firm, Young Jackson who paces to and fro on the platform at Mugby Junction in an objectless manner. We are told that Barbox Brothers had been a bill-broking firm. Young Jackson had just closed up all that was left of the firm and retired from business a hardened man. Besides bill-broking, other things had hardened Young Jackson: the only woman he ever loved had eloped with the only friend he ever had, and the two were married. Here we have a nice piece of work cut out for Mr. Charles Dickens. Young Jackson has to be softened. Mr. Dickens' favorite recipe for softening a hard man is to bring him in contact with a crippled damsel or a strangely smart and eccentric child. Young Jackson being a peculiarly hard case in consequence of having been so long engaged in the bill-broking line, is found to require both. Young Jackson makes the acquaintance of Lamps at the Junction, and tries to derive some amusement from him as he sits in the cabin where he keeps his carriage lamps. Mugby Junction is a very dull place, but still Young Jackson stays there because he has no wish to go anywhere in particular. Lamps failing him in consequence of his business engagements, Young Jackson wanders about among the few cottages which surround the Junction. Out of one of these cottages he sees a crowd of children proceeding:

"Ascending a gentle hill of some extent, he came to a few cottages. There, looking about him as a very reserved man might who had never looked about him in his life before, he saw some six or eight young children come merrily trooping and whooping from one of the cottages, and disperse. But not until they had all turned at the little garden gate, and kissed their hands to a face at the upper window: a low window enough, although the upper, for the cottage had but a story of one room above the ground.

Now, that the children should do this was nothing; but that they should do this to a face lying on the sill of the open window, turned towards them in a horizontal position, and apparently only a face, was something noticeable. He looked up at the window again. Could only see a very fragile though a very bright face, lying on one cheek on the window sill. The delicate smiling face of a girl or woman. Framed in long bright brown hair, round which was tied a light blue band or fillet, passing under the chin.

He walked on, turned back, passed the window again, shyly glanced up again. No change. He struck off by a winding branch-road at the top of the hill,—which he must have otherwise have descended,—kept the cottages in view, worked his way round at a distance so as to come out once more into the main road and be obliged to pass the cottages again. The face still lay on the window-sill, but not so much inclined towards him. And now there were a pair of delicate hands too. They had the action of performing on some musical instrument, and yet it produced no sound that reached his ears."

After some days he finds himself in the cottage. The face which he has seen is that of Phœbe—Lamps' daughter—who disabled by a fall when an infant, has been confined to her bed ever since. She is now about thirty, is patient and happy. She teaches the children and occupies herself with lace making. When Lamps comes in and discovers young Jackson who is called at the Junction "The Gentleman from Nowhere," the following takes place:

"Upon my word, my dear," said Lamps then to his daughter, looking from her to her visitor, "it is such an amaze to me, to find you brought acquainted with this gentleman, that I must (if this gentleman will excuse me) take a rounder."

Mr. Lamps demonstrated in action what this meant, by pulling out his oily handkerchief rolled up in the form of a ball, and giving himself an elaborate smear, from behind the right ear, up the cheek, across the forehead, and down the other cheek to behind his left ear. After this operation he shone exceedingly.

"It's according to my custom when particular warmed up by any agitation, sir," he offered by way of apology. "And really, I am throwed into that state of amaze by finding you brought acquainted with Phœbe, that I—that I think I will, if you'll excuse me, take another rounder." Which he did, seeming to be greatly restored by it.

All Mr. Dickens' readers will be in ecstacies of delight at the above. They will say, "now isn't that like Dickens!" "that's Dickens all over!" and otherwise express their satisfaction at Lamps' "rounders." Young Jackson's visits to Phœbe have a softening effect on him; she leads him to reflect that there may be some occupation for him in life and determines to explore the seven roads.

What he heard from the Boy at the Refreshment Room, the signal-man on No 1, Branch Line, the engine-driver on No 2, Branch Line and others are written by Phœbe and himself.

He first makes a trip on the main line to "a great ingenious town" for the purpose of puchasing a key-concertina like a minature piano to rest occasionally in the place of the lace cushion that Phœbe may amuse herself by picking out tunes on it. After he has concluded his researches at the heads of the seven roads, Phœbe advises him to return again to "the great ingenious town."

"Would you miud taking that road again, sir?" she asked with hesitation.

'Not in the least; it is a great high road after all.'

'I should like you to take it,' returned Phœbe, with a persuasive smile, 'for the love of that little present which must ever be so dear to me. I should like you to take it, in remembrance of your having done me so much good; of your having made me so much happier! If you leave me by the road you traveled when you went to do me this great kindness,' sounding a faint chord as she spoke, 'I shall feel, lying here watching at my window, as if it must conduct you to a prosperous end, and bring you back some day.'

'It shall be done, my dear: it shall be done.'

So at last the gentleman for Nowhere took a ticket for Somewhere, and his destination was the great ingenious town.'"

As soon as he arrives at the end of his journey, after having left the crippled damsel, who has done so much to soften him, he meets the extraordinary child:

"Although he had arrived at his journey's end for the day by noon, he had since insensibly walked about the town so far and so long that the lamp-lighters were now at their work in the streets, and the shops were sparkling up brilliantly. Thus reminded to turn towards his quarters, he was in the act of doing so, when a very little hand crept into his, and a very little voice said,—

'O! If you please, I am lost!'

He looked down, and saw a very little, fair-haired girl,

'Yes,' she said, confirming her words with a serious nod. 'I am indeed. I am lost.'

Greatly perplexed, he stopped, looked about him for help, descried none, and said, bending low:

'Where do you live, my child?'

'I don't know where I live,' she returned. 'I am lost.'

'What is your name?'

'Polly.'

'What is your other name?'

The reply was prompt, but unintelligible.

Imitating the sound as he caught it, he hazarded the guess "Trivits?"

"O no!" said the child, shaking her head. "Nothing like that."

"Say it again, little one."

An unpromising business. From this time it had quite a different sound.

He made the venture, "Paddens?"

"O no!" said the child. "Nothing like that."

"Once more. Let us try it again, dear."

A most hopeless business. This time it swelled into four syllables. "It can't be Tappitarver?" said Barbox Brothers, rubbing his head with his hat in discomfiture.

"No! It ain't," the child quietly assented.

On her trying this unfortunate name once more, with extraordinary efforts at distinctness, it swelled into eight syllables at least.

"Ah! I think," said Barbox Brothers, with a desperate air of resignation, "that we had better give it up."

"But I am lost," said the child, nestling her little hand more closely in his, "and you'll take care of me, won't you?"

The child is a very strange child, an impossible child, but "so like Dickens." She teaches Young Jackson to build card houses, to tell stories—Fairy stories in which, though untrue, there is no harm, snubs Young Jackson, makes him blush; (Young Jackson is probably about fifty; "Young" was the name given him by his god-fathers and god-mothers,) and altogether behaves as no child but a Dickens child ever did behave. But she is very charming. "So like Dickens." She is like "Little Nell," like the impossible infant "Johnnie" in Our Mutual Friend, who made his will, being aware that death was at hand, prepared himself to meet it with Christian resignation, bequeathing his toys to the infant who lay in the next bed to his by holding out a horse and saying, "him."

Polly is fetched by her mother who turns out to be the only woman Young Jackson ever loved, who married the only friend he ever had. When he went into the music store to buy the Key-concertina for Phœbe, she was there; she heard him say he was going back to Mugby Junctiou and laid for him day after day at the station in the great ingenious town, hoping he might return. When she at length met him she told Polly to go and tell him she was lost. She begs Young Jackson to forgive Nesham her husband. She says:

"I was very young, he was young too, and in the ignorant hardihood of such a time of life we don't know what we do to those who have undergone more discipline. You generous man! You good man! So to raise me up and make nothing of my crime against you!—for he would not see her on her knees, and soothed her as a kind father might have soothed an erring daughter—thank you, bless you, thank you!"

Young Jackron has become quite softened, he takes Polly back to Tresham and blesses all of them.

No one can imaginehow prettily Dickens tells this story which we have so cruelly garbled and have hardened as much as Young Jackson was softeued—they must read it for themselves. The end of it was:—

"He went back to Mugby Junction, and in point of fact he established himself at Mugby Junction. It was the convenient place to live in, for brightening Phœbe's life. It was the convenient place to live in, for having her taught music by Beatrice. It was the convenient place to live in, for occasionally borrowing Polly. It was the convenient place to live in, for being joined at will to all sorts of agreeable places and persons. So, he became settled there, and, his house standing in an elevated situation, it is noteworthy of him in conclusion, as Polly herself might (not irreverently) have put it,

There was an Old Barbox who lived on a hill,
And if he ain't gone, he lives there still."

In the account of the Refreshment-room, given by "The Boy at Mugby," Mr. Dickens constantly forgets that it is not he, Mr. Dickens, but "The Boy at Mugby," who is speaking. This sounds like "The Boy:"

"You should hear Our Missis give the word 'Here comes the Beast to be Fed!' and then you should see 'em indignantly skipping across the Line, from the Up to the Down, or Wieer Warsaw, and begin to pitch the stale pastry into the plates, and chuck the sawdust sangwiches under the glass covers, and get out the —ha ha ha!—the Sherry—O my eye, my eye!—for your Refreshment."

"The Boy," however, must be as extraordinary as one of the Dickens female children, who would thus describe a scene where a Frenchman tries to help himself to a glass of brandy from the decanter, and is attacked by the missis:

"The foreigner turned pale, stepped back with his arms stretched out in front of him, his hands clasped, and his shoulders riz, and exclaimed: 'Ah! Is it possible this? That these disdaineous females and this ferocious old woman are placed here by the administration, not only to empoison the voyagers, but to affront them! Great Heaven! How arrives it? The English people. Or is he then a slave? Or idiot?'"

That doesn't sound like "the Boy." Neither does the following description of an American—though it is a bad enough caricature to emanate from a small boy who had never met an American—sound like the utterance of "The Boy at Mugby."

"Another time, a merry, wideawake American gent had tried the sawdust and spit it out, and had tried the Sherry and spit that out, and had tried in vain to sustain the exhausted natur upon Butter-Scotch, and had been rather extra Bandolined and Line surveyed through, when, as the bell was ringing, and he paid Our Missis, he says, very loud and good-tempered: "I tell Yew what 'tis, ma'arm. I la'af. Theer! I la'af. I Dew. I oughter ha' seen most things, for I hail from the Onlimited side of the Atlantic Oeean, and I haive traveled right slick over the Limited, head on through Jee-rusalemm and the East, and likeways France and Italy, Europe Old World, and am now upon the track to the Chief Europian Village: but such an Institution as Yew, and Yewer young ladies, and Yewer fixin's solid and liquid, afore the glorious Tarnal I never did see yet! Aud it I hain't found the eighth wonder of monarchieal Creation, in finding Yew, and Yewer young ladies, and Yewer fixin's solid and liquid, all as aforesaid, established in a country where the people air not absolute Loo-naticks, I am Extra Double Darned with a Nip and Frizzle to the innermostest grit! Wheerfur—Theer!—I la'af! I Dew, ma'arm. I la'af!" And so he went, stamping aud shaking his sides, along the platform all the way to his own compartment."

That would be a very bad specimen of a stage Yankee. "I am Extra Double Darned with a Nip and Frizzle to the innermostest grit," is not an American oath. "The Boy at Mugby" was probably dashed off in a hurry to fill up. Though it is an admirable satire on the Railway Refreshment Saloons of England, it is a careless production as purporting to emanate from the "The Boy." "The Signal-Man" is a thrilling tale. "The Engineer," by Amelia B. Edwards, is extremely well written. and the interest is worked up to a telling climax. We have said enough to prove that "Dickens' Christmas Story Mugby Junction," will please all who read it, but at the same time we have been bold enough to attempt to criticise even Charles Dickens, whom we as well as most other people consider the greatest novelist living.

BOB BARNACLE, SKIPPER, OF COD-COVE.

THE RECORD OF AN EXTINCT KINDRED.

BY CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

BOB BARNACLE was once touched to the quick. He saw his mother laid away, and put turf above her, yet only said, "She was too good for the world; he knew she was better off there." Tough as he was, he seemed to mellow and to soften a little, like a peach in the sun, when he turned his fiery face upward and said, "there." He seemed almost to follow after the fair soul of his old mother with his searching eye.

His long time chum, Luke Scupper, as bold a man as ever chawed blubber, he saw in turn chawed by a living representative of the blubber aforesaid. Skipper Bob was blue for three days and three nights, but at the expiration of that brief season of mourning he awoke to life, and his old self again, remarking with a certain degree of satisfaction, "that fish got his belly-full when he took in Luke Scupper."

Then his delicate, good Mary, sickened and fell away, some said with longing after little Luke abroad upon the seas with his rough father.

When the boy came to gladden the old sailor, he talked much of his swallowed friend, and said "his name is good to hear, and to hear often," so the lad bore it after him; but his affinity to the deceased Scupper was as the pearl to the oyster, nothing closer.

So Mary perished of love and longing; bleeding to death as it were, of the cleft artery of love, that broken, found no stop or bandage, or nourishment to heal and satisfy.

Bob Barnacle, Skipper of Cod-Cove, he hugged the little orphan closer, and beat the frail bark like a rough sea, in enormous demonstrations of fondness. Little Luke had like to have been crushed in the strong arms of his father, but he loved to feel the pain of that rude man's embrace—it was so honest and convincing. He pawed him with clumsy tenderness, like a dog, and Luke endured it without murmur, for he was comforted.

Thus Luke lay in his father's arms, while he, Bob Barnacle, Skipper of Cod-Cove, lay off and on about the cottage, darkened and desolate, and full of the wailing of complaining waters, that were old friends to him.

"He thanked God they could still sing to him and cheer him," while Luke, the motherless, moaned on his breast.

Time went by, and Bob Barnacle, Skipper of Cod-Cove, and little Luke, now grown slender and white with a youth's lawful longings, that seemed to stretch him too rapidly, hung together like vine and branch.

How soon, poor vine, already thinned with clipping and transplanting, and the chill of death, and the fire of doubt and fear. How soon was thy last frail ligament swept away, thy limb lopped off, and thou sorely withered in the recoil of stricken love.

There came an hour when Luke seemed dying, with no ills. Only the incessant calling of something spiritual, and the desire to follow after that still voice—these sapped the fragile plant. Silent often since his mother's death, nothing earthly interested or employed his mind. Could it be in that divorce of death, the only one God sanctions, his wise decision gave the custody of that child to her?

Luke died as the flower dies, folding himself for death as for a sleep. Life went out quietly, fading like one snow-flake falling upon the warm wrist. His spirit seemed drawn up to God in a ray of glory, as a water-drop out of the great sea. And being just, as no man could doubt, he was made perfect in the eye of the Lord. * * * * * Bob Barnacle, Skipper of Cod-Cove, what of him?

Touched to the quick once in his life, he was tried and found not wanting. At Luke's grave skipper Bob, now childless, bowed for a moment, and was shaken like the oak; but when he rose, strong to do battle, and withstand it, his brown face glowed with the fine beauty of bronze. It was like some grotesque figure upon a stained window, lit from within, and that light shone from the altar-candles. He stood as one singing in the midst of the fiery-furnace seven times heated.

Luke was his faithful and unswerving needle, and Luke's death sealed his course. He turned to him now, as to a star, translated.

He was not wrecked; his mind never once swung at anchor or tossed among rocks and shoals—he knew his chart and kept it. Late in life, when his head was white as the snow-hills of Labrador, he quit the sea, as a mother quits her child, knowing it to be able to take care of itself. Yet then he was not cast down or fretful. He was ashore, an old hulk, battered and weather-beaten, but not a wreck. He condemned himself and complacently laid up; still his ribs and transoms never failed him. There was no settling to one side, no warping of timbers, no gradual decay, and he was sustained to this endurance by his steadfast faith. He felt:

"The bright little cherub that sits up aloft
To watch o'er the life of poor Jack,"

was his Luke—born of dew of his youth out of the womb of the morning. So his days multiplied in peace. He talked often and mostly of his Luke—or of poor Mary and the good mother, long since dead. Nor was the late Mr. Scupper, mariner, forgotten or suffered a reasonable digesting. He insisted to the last, with a sort of mournful exhilaration, that "Luke Scupper was probably the least digestible of his former friends."

When skipper Bob did go to pieces, as we each must, he went all at once, every part of him, and the sea took the fragments to herself, as her own well beloved and foster child. And that strong soul, loosed suddenly, as an eagle is set free—with exultation and confidence sped heavenward.

Rest his timbers. Bob Barnacle, skipper of Cod-Cove; royal father of little Luke, and true son of the sea, Vale! Vale! Vale!

San Francisco, December, 1866.

THE SECOND BEST CONCERT OF THE SEASON.—On New Year's Eve a rather delightful reunion of the musical artists and dilettanti of San Francisco, took place at Charley Smith's. The major portion of "The Twelve" were present. Professor Evans presided at the piano, and glees, choruses and songs, were sung in a manner which delighted the select few present. Mr. Henri Herberte sang the splendid descriptive song of "Rizzio," which the public have never as yet heard. Mr. Wunderlich sang the beautiful song, "The White Squall," words by the late Major Richard Johns, of the Royal Marines Light Infantry, (falsely attributed by an unscrupulous music stealer in this country, to Barry Cornwall.) music by George Barker. A capital cold collation was provided by those who originated the entertainment, and numerous bowls of punch concocted on scientific principles, were disposed of and unanimously endorsed. Alas! The holidays are over.

ON OCEAN WAIF.

It was now dark, but not like the night before, for the stars shone out brightly overhead, and there was a brisk breeze blowing. I could just make the ship out, and could see that they had bronght up; but felt sure that we could not be seen. Once I thought I heard a shout; then there was the flash of a gun; and then the fools began to burn blue-lights, thinking, I suppose, that we were flies ready to go and burn our wings. But I saw my way clear now; and set to work, and shipped the rudder as well as I could in the dark; cleared and stepped the little mast; and before long had the sail set, with a reef in it, for the breeze blew fresh; and then knowing pretty well where the ship lay, shaped to give her the go-by in the dark; when I felt sure they would wait about all night, and with the breeze then on, and the long dark hours before me, I hoped yet to get clear off.

Just then, they burned another blue-light; and I hove several points off, and kept on till we were far enough, when I put the boat's head before the wind; when she seemed to leap through the water, and dashed away like a live thing. Another blue-light far astern, and then another when we were a mile or two off, and again another faint glow far astern, and then I fancied I saw another, but it must have been but fancy, for the bright stars overhead shed the only light that we could see.

"Only pray for this wind to keep up, miss, and we'll never see the Star again."

"Then are we saved indeed?" whispered a voice; but it was not her; and on speaking again, I found that Mary had given up at last, and was now sobbing in her sister's lap, when she, the poor weak one, roused up directly, and was soothing and comforting her sister, who had held up so long and so bravely.

The little boat scudded away before the wind, at a rate that seemed to lend fresh vigor to me every moment. Soon after Mary was sitting calm and quiet beside me as I steered, so as to get all the speed out of the boat I could; and after a bit, in the stillness of that bright and beautiful night, she offered up a simple prayer, and so sweet and touching that it brought tears from my eyes, unused enough to such weakness; but then I had been wounded, and had had a hard time of it. I'd heard prayers read often enough by the captains I'd sailed with, and been to church times enough, but never heard words like those, that seemed to move the heart, as they offered thanks for our preservation from so great a peril, and prayed forgiveness for our desperate resolve. And then there was a deep silence among us for some time, and the brisk breeze bore us along gallantly, so that one's heart seemed to bound with the boat, and it was all I could do to keep from shaking out more sail.

After a while, Mary crept forward, and saw to poor Tom, who still lay in a heavy sleep; and then forced some biscuit, wine, and water upon me; when I made that an excuse for getting them both to take some, and I wanted them to try and get some rest. But no; they both said they would sit with me, and they did, too, all through that long night, when that breeze, which was truly for us the breath of heaven, never once failed, but bore us bravely on, and on, with hope rising in our breasts, till we saw the stars pale, the glow in the east, and the sun once more leap up, and shed the golden path across the waters, now dancing with life!

Although we were going so free, before the sun rose I downed the sail, and when there was the full daylight, I looked long and anxiously for the ship, and again and again sweeping the horizon well: but there was not a mast in sight, and so I told those anxious ones, whose lips were quivering, and who dared not ask the question. "Not a sail in sight," I said; and I up with our own once more; and away we went over the bright and dancing waters, while so great was the change which had now come over me, that, in spite of calling myself a fool for fancying it, I could not help looking at a pale face at my side, and thinking how sweet it would be to go on sailing like this forever. But directly after, there came another change over me, and I felt bitter, and sorrowful, and dull, and I couldn't tell myself why it was, unless it was because I was such a poor common man, though it had never seemed to matter before.

CHAPTER VII.

I contrived an awning this day, and on we still bounded before the wind, for the breeze held good, keeping as steady as could be. The ladies slept by turns, and watched by turns poor Tom, who seemed, poor fellow, to be getting worse and worse, and we unable to do more than tend him lovingly; and we did, too, for he had been like a brother to me; but all seemed no use, and the poor fellow lay at last quite light-headed. It was no use; I could do no more. I kept up to the very last, and until I felt myself going to sleep every minute, when Mary took the tiller out of my hand, declaring she could steer, ordered me to lie down.

I didn't want to do so, but I knew I must sleep sooner or later, so I gave her a word or two of instruction, and she promised to call me if there was the least need; and then, with the sun just sinking, I lay down, to be asleep in an instant—a deep sleep—for I was worn out: but I only seemed to have just lain down when I opened my eyes again to see the sun rising, Mary pale and quiet-looking, with her white hand clasping the tiller, and the little boat still going free before the wind.

I jumped up, for I was savage and ashamed of myself, and asked her why she had not woke me.

"I was only too glad to have been of some use," she said, and then she gave up the tiller; and after Madeline had brought out some of the provision, they both lay down, and had a long sleep.

And so we sailed on for days and days, steering nearly due north, in hope of making land or crossing the path of some vessel; and then it fell calm. Poor Tom had been tended with all the care we could give to him, but in spite of all we did, he grew worse and worse; and at last, when he recovered his senses a bit, he was so weak and feeble that we could scarcely catch his words. He talked to us, too, a good deal and did not seem sorrowful or unhappy, though he said he knew he was going.

"I've been no good to you!" he said to Mary as she was kneeling down weeping by his side one evening when there was not enough air to make the sail flap—"I've been no good to you, but I did what I could. Put her head a bit more to the west, Jack," he added, and just managed to take Mary's hand, and put it to his lips; and then "Jack," he says, "you have had it all to do, mate, and you have got it to finish; and I won't ask my old mate to swear, but you'll do what is right by them both, won't you?"

"Ay, my lad," I said, "I will," and the water came in my eyes as I said it; for he spoke so that I was afraid something was very nigh indeed.

"Then I shall go easy, Jack, mate, for I am going to give up the number of my mess;" and then he was silent for a bit, till Miss Mary sobbed quite aloud, and said she was going to lose a dear true friend.

"No," said Tom, smiling sadly, "only a poor sailor, Miss, as tried to do his duty by you, and broke down; but Jack here will take my watch for me; and God bless you all, for I don't think I shall see the sun go down again."

"Come, Tom I says, "try and look up, mate;" but it was done in a cheerless way, and the poor fellow only smiled sadly.

"It was that chap Hicks as did for me, mate," he said; and then he looked hard at me, and we understood one another, for he looked as he did that morning when he told me to wash the blood off my face, and somehow or other I could not help feeling glad I had made an end of the villain who gave my poor mate his death-blow

And my poor Tom lay half-sleeping, half-waking, all that calm night, and I watched by him till just as the sun was beginning to rise, when he seemed to quite wake up, and stared out toward the east, as it had been called.

"What is it, mate?" I say, lifting his head on my arm and taking his hand.

"Tell them I'm ordered aloft, Jack," he whispered; and then, with quite a smile upon his face, my poor mate closed his eyes and dropped off into his long sleep; and there, with the sun shining upon his face, I didn't know it, he went off so quietly, till I heard the young ladies sobbing behind me, when I gently laid his head down, and sat at his side with my face in my hands for sometime, for Tom Black and I were old shipmates.

It was a sad blow that to fall upon our little ship's company; but I did all as I knew my poor mate would have liked, and as I know he would have done by me. I lashed him up in one of the sheets, with a shot at his feet—one that had been in the boat for ballast—and at sundown, Miss Mary said some prayers over the poor fellow, and then, with a more sorrowful heart than ever I felt before, I hove my poor mate overboard, and then sat down in the bows, feeling as if I did not mind how soon it was me as was called, till I thought of what I had promised poor Tom, which was to do my duty by them as was in my charge; when I roused up, tried to make all ship-shape, and waited for the wind, which soon came, and and away we dashed again all that night.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Put her head a bit more to the west, Jack," said poor Tom, and I did; and taking turn and turn with me, Miss Mary gave me a watch below, or, of course, I could not have held up; and one day—the second after poor Tom went—I was dreaming about what was the case, namely, that our supply of water was out, when I felt my arm shook, and waking up in a fright, I found that Miss Mary had thrown the wind out of the sail, and there she was, looking frightened and horrified-like at a vessel standing right across our course.

O, what shall we do?" she cried.

"Frigate," I says, "man-o'-war," as I took a good look at the stranger.

"What! not the Star?" she exclaimed, clasping her hands.

"No," I says, taking the tiller, and running down towards the stranger; but though we were out of water, I could not help doing it with a heavy heart, for it seemed that a great change was coming. But those two loving heart were together, and when I saw them praying, I kept my eye upon the frigate and would not show what was passing in my own mind.

In a couple of hours we were along side, and the boat was hoisted on board, and the ladies had the cabin given up to 'em; but it fell to my lot to tell the story of our sufferings, and I did to the captain and some of the officers, for it was a Queen's ship. I saw the captain frown more than once, and get up in a hasty fretful way, and begin to walk up and down the room till I'd done, when he says, "My man, we must have you, if you'll stay with us."

A few days after, we were at the Cape, where the captain stopped to land the ladies, of whom I had seen but very little since we went on board the frigate, for they hardly left the cabin, though it was wonderful what respect the officer paid them, and how kind everyone was to me, specially when they saw how them two ran to speak to and shake hands with me when they did come on deck.

I thought it all over; what the captain had said, and all about it; and I went to see the ladies once by their own invitation, while they were staying at a gentleman's house: and I felt more low and sad than ever when I saw them dressed in deep mourning, for it brought all the scenes up again of that unlucky voyage; but I tried to rouse up, for though no scholar, and only a sailor, I knew as it was now time to wake up from a sort of wild dream as I had been in.

So I said "good-by" to them, and they both cried at our parting, and made me promise that I would go to see them when I was in England; for I knew that their passage home was taken, and I had made up my mind what was best; and I told the ladies I was going to join the frigate. It was a sad afternoon that, and they seemed both of them cut to the heart to say "good-by," and I was too. But the words were said at last, and they each gave me a little ring to wear upon my handkercher for their sake; and then, when I was coming away, Miss Madeline first put both her hands in mine, and put her face up as naturally and tenderly as a little child would, and then kissed me; and then Miss Mary put both her hands in mine—little white, soft hands in my rough, horny palms—and she, too, with a childish, loving innocence, and with the tears running down her cheeks, said "good-by," and she, too, kissed me as a dear sister would a brother.

There was a feeling as of something chocking in my throat as I tried to say the parting words, for I was now quite awake from the sort of dream that of late had come on me at times, and I hurried away.

We did not return to England for two years after that; but before I had been ashore—almost as soon as we were in port—there was some one on board as wanted to see me, and I was soon standing face to face with a tall, sharp eyed, officer-looking gentleman, who told me his name was Captain Horton; and he shook hands heartily, and thanked me for what he called my gallant behavior to his sisters. He said I was to go and see them, and he left a letter from the young ladies and their address; and when he went away told me, and gave it me on a paper, that there was fifty pounds for me in one of the banks whenever I liked to draw it; and also, that I was never to want for a friend while he and his sisters lived; and then he shook hands, and left me standing thinking of the by-gone, and looking at the letter he left.

It said I was to go and see them; and there was a good deal in it about the past, and what she, too, called my gallant behavior, when it was nothing more than my duty. And she said, too, that they would ever pray for my welfare, and begged that I would keep the money for their sake. The letter and the money lie together in my chest; and so sure as I take 'em out and look at them, I get in that dreamy way again; and at times, in the long watches far away at sea there's a bright face with golden hair floating round it, which seems to smile on me, and it's there too in calm or storm; and when I've hung over the bulwarks thinking, and calling back all the troubles of that sad voyage, I've thought, perhaps, that if I had been something better than a common sailor, what I felt might have been love.

And now you have it all down, sir, though I can't tell you what became of the Southern Star, though I've always thought as she went to the bottom from being badly handled.

The great slumbering volcano, Popocatapetl, has recently been explored by a party which reports the crater accessible. Millions of tons of sulphur are lying in there, and in many places in a pure state. It can be carried to the summit of the volcano, and from thence to the base of that eternally snow-crowned mountain, at an expense of only 50 cents the hundred pounds. The value of 100 pounds in Mexico is $10. The crater is big enough to hold several cities, but it is not probable that any will be built there at present.

Beauty is the woman you love, whatever she may seem to others.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND

IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

For sale by CALEB M. SICKLER,

422 Kearny street,

Between California and Pine, San Francisco.

Repairs for Stewart's Stoves constantly on hand.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

WHAT SHOULD BE WORN AND WHAT SHOULD NOT.

Ladies must make up their minds to wear short petticoats and narrow crinolines, for before long no fashionable lady will be seen walking along the streets with a train. The court and aristocratic circles in Paris have set the example, only it is probable that they will abandon entirely the colored petticoat, and replace it definitely with one cut from the same material as the dress. The arrangement of this new style of toilet (with two skirts, so to speak) will be as follows: First, a petticoat will be made to reach as far as the knee with any material that is convenient; to this will be joined a deep border of the same material as the dress. The border is plain at the edge, and if any trimming is desired, it is placed above the straight hem. The second or upper skirt is very narrow round the hips, and is cut out at the edge in large round scallops. This edge is occasionally varied according to taste by cutting it in squares like the top of a battlement, or in vandykes or festoons; but, whatever form it assumes, it is always bordered either with velvet, gimp, or a narrow silk fringe.

Bands made partly of satin and partly of velvet are now sold for petticoat trimmings. They are very handsome, and are advantageous in this respect—they can be easily imitated and mounted by a skillful maid without the aid of a professed dressmaker, and also pieces of velvet and satin, that may have lain by as too small for other purposes, can now be utilized for trimming winter petticoats; the narrower the alternate strips of velvet and satin are the better is their effect.

Dresses are now made with basquines which are simulated with trimming. When the trimming is of rather a heavy description, such as either thick silk or chenille fringe, or a pinked-out ruche, the illusion is complete, and the effect leads one to suppose that the dress has a basquine. This simulated basquine naturally fits well, being the bodice.

The Gabrielle or Princess form of dress which has been so very popular, has by no means dethroned the small jackets; and now that ladies have found out what an exceedingly useful garment a small jacket is, they will cling to the fashion pertinaciously. They are still made without sleeves for dressy toilets, and of lace with sleeves for wearing over low dresses. Beads are so fashionable that they are imitated in gimp, particularly the white beads which have been lavished on black gimps. The effect is pretty, but these simulations possess a great advantage over the reality in being lighter than the glass and jet beads.

There are no evening dresses without a peplum. They make them of crape embroidered in silk, or covered with a rain of gold or silver beads. The prettiest we have seen in a peplum of white crape spangled with coral beads, with a coral fringe all round. Those striped white stuffs which they call sultane, are employed to make very dressy day peplums. They are then made high with large sleeves, or evening peplums, serving as opera cloaks. With tarlatane dresses, which are much worn at parties, they put on tight silk peplums; with gaze de Chambery dresses peplums are of the same material. Tight peplums are often cut with five points, two upon the sides and three behind, so that it is no more a peplum but a variety of basque, still it is very graceful when the points are not too long. A fringe of silk or weeds remains a charming trimming.

Silk materials continue to be very dear in Paris, and yet they often serve merely as a groundwork for the reception of copious designs in jet beads, applied with elegant taste, is the latest novelty in the way of Parisian dress; we have just seen such a dress, belonging to a lady who is well known as one of the leaders of the fashion, and we were assured that a fortnight was passed by the needle woman engaged for the application of the beads. It is almost needless to add that such a robe is rather heavy to the wearer, and extremely expensive.

A collection of new ornaments for dresses and bonnets has just been brought out by several of the principal marchands de nouveautes. These ornaments consist of silk and lace, tastefully combined to suit the color of the dress, and they will certainly for a time replace the beautiful artificial flowers which have so long enjoyed the almost exclusive patronage of the haut ton.

Zekle crep' up, quite unbeknown,
An' peeked in thru the winder,
An' there sot Huldy all alone,
'Ith no one nigh to hender.

'Agin the chimbly crooknecks hung,
An' in among 'em rusted
The queen's arm that gran'ther Young
Fetched back from Concord busted.

The wannut logs shot sparkles out
Towards the pootiest, bless her;
An' leetle fires danced all about
The chiny on the dresser.

The very room, coz she was in,
Looked warm from floor to ceilin',
An' she looked full as rosy agin
As the apples she was peelin',

She heerd a foot, an' knowed it, tu,
A raspin' on the scraper—
All ways to once her feelin's flew
Like sparks in burnt-up paper.

He kin' o' l'itered on the mat,
Some doubtful o' the seekle;
His heart kep' goin' pity-pat,
But hern went pity Zekle.

An' yet she gin her cheer a jerk
Ez though she wished him further,
An' on her apples kep' to work
Ez ef a wager spurred her.

"You want to see my pa, I s'pose?"
"Wal, no; I come designin'——'
"To see my ma? She's sprinklin' clo'es
Agin to-morrow's i'nin"

He stood a spell on one foot fust,
Then stood a spell on t'other,
An' on which one he felt the wust
He couldn't ha' told you, nuther.

Sez he, "I'd better call agin;"
Sez she, "Think likely, Mister!
The last words pricked him like a pin,
An'—wal, he up and kist her.

When ma himehy, upon 'em slips,
Huldy sot, pale as ashes,
All kind o' smily round the lips
An' teary round the lashes.

Her blood riz quick, though, like the tide

I CANNOT SING THE NEW SONGS.

I cannot sing the new songs,
They are such wretched stuff;
Of coarseness and insanity
I've had my quantum suff.

Why must I long when singing
For changes—in a word,
Desire to be a daisy,
Or wish to be a bird?

I cannot sing the comic songs,
They make me sick and sad—
But the ballads of the drawing-room
Are twenty times as bad!

A BOSTON CONGREGATION TREATED TO A WALTZ OR TWO.—In one of the smaller halls of Boston there is on exhibition a curious musical instrument from Germany, called the orchestrion, like an organ in outward aspect, and like a music-box in a cylinder movement, operated by clock-work. On Saturday night the proprietors wound it up, ready to be started at the Monday afternoon concert, but on the intervening Sunday the hall was occupied by a religious society, and during the time of meeting, something jarred the instrument so that it began to play. The piece was a waltz, and the audience listened in amusement—the preacher with consternation. No one knew how to stop it, and the obstinate machine went on playing one piece after another in steady succession, until some ingenious sympathizer with the interrupted meeting found a means to get inside and unhook one of the weights.

THE St. Paul papers mention a joke perpetrated upon several hundred star gazing meteor-watching people of that city, by some wags, who procured a dozen sky-rockets and a number of Roman candles, and at once commenced sending them up in the darkness, to the astonishment of hundreds of beholders, who considered the pyrotecnic exhibition as the regularly-advertised shooting stars. The comments of many observers were amusing, and not a few still contend that the meteoric shower of 1866 was far superior to the demonstration in 1832, because in the former the stars were of many brilliant colors.

AYER'S
CHERRY PECTORAL,
FOR THE RAPID CURE OF
COUGHS, COLDS, INFLUENZA, HOARSENESS, CROUP, BRONCHITIS, INCIPIENT CONSUMPTION, AND FOR THE RELIEF OF CONSUMPTIVE PATIENTS IN ADVANCED STAGES OF THE DISEASE.

SO wide is the field of its usefulness and so numerous are the cases of its cures, that almost every section of country abounds in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other Expectorant is too apparent to escape observation and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs that are incident to our climate. While many inferior remedies thrust upon the community have failed and been discarded, this having gained friends by every trial, conferred benefits on the afflicted they can never forget, and produced cures too numerous and too remarkable to be forgotten.
We can only assure the public, that its quality is carefully kept up to the best it ever has been, and that it may be relied on to do for their relief all that it has ever done.
Great numbers of clergymen, Physicians, Statesmen, and eminent personages, have lent their names to certify the unparalleled usefulness of our remedies, but space here will not permit the insertion of them. The Agents below named furnish gratis our AYERICAN ALMANAC in which they are given; with also full descriptions of the complaints they cure.
Those who require an alterative medicine to purify the blood will find AYER'S COMPOUND EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA the remedy to use. Try it once, and you will know its value.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me" A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I WILL aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale" IBID.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO

Taciturn John Bright.

John Bright in a letter to Cyrus M. Field written shortly after the Cable Banquet says:—

"I wish I could have been at the dinner, for my reluctance to make a speech would have been overcome by a desire to say something about you and about the cable, and its immense significance both to our old world and to your new one."

We cannot refrain from italicising the words in which John Bright alludes to his unfortunate failing. Everyone may not perhaps be aware that John Bright when be does manage to overcome bis reluctance to make a speech, commences:—

"Unaccustomed as I am to public speaking. What tortures John Bright must have undergone during the past fifteen years! He has still not quite overcome his reluctance to make a speech. How happy would the Derby Ministry be if John Bright's reluctance to make a speech became insurmountable! However reluctant John Bright may be to make a speech, no one who has once heard him can be reluctant to stand hour after hour to listen to one of his speeches. There are so few of the public men of England who understand the art of addressing, the public moving to their sympathies, charming away their reason by appealing to their hearts, and in fact taking them captive by the ears that John Bright may well be considered a dangerous opponent by the Tory party. Lord Derby makes speeches that read extremely well in the Times, Disraeli's speeches are masterly specimens of intellectual oratory, and are altogether admirable—in print; but this dangerous John Bright, whenever he "overcomes his reluctance to make a speech," gains the hearts of his hearers. Even those who are utterly opposed to the sentiments which he is uttering are carried away by the sweetness of his voice, the grace of his gestures and the earnestness and seeming truthfulness with which he speaks. There is not the slightest taint of raut in John Bright's style. He clinches his arguments with as little manifestation of effort as the ponderous steam power hammer flattens at a blow half a ton of iron—this same power-hammer is at the same time capable of cracking the shell of a nut with such well regulated power that the kernel is left unbruised. John Bright's pow rs of oratory resemble in some measure, the mechanical powers of the steam hammer. When John Bright overcomes bis natural taciturnity, we may expect to hear some important speeches from him on the subject of Reform in England, a subject in which be is much interested and on which be would doubtless have spoken ere this had he been able to overcome his reluctance to making a speech.

Board of Education Economy.

The Board of Education appear inclined to practise a style of economy which is characterized by sensible people as "saving at the spile and letting out at the bung hole." They have evinced the most reckless extravagance in building ornamental school houses, they now propose to "economize" by reducing the salaries of the teachers. The lady teachers as a rule, are now paid about $67 a month; a waiter girl in a lager beer saloon is paid $75 a month. It is proposed for the sake of economy, to reduce the pay of the educated ladies engaged in the arduous task of teaching lower still. Mr. Pelton stated that "he could fill a number of positions at $25 a month." He spoke somewhat as follows:

"I am assured, that some of those who have made applications for teachers will work for even half salaries. for six months to come. Why not employ those ladies at low salaries? I undertake to say, that I can fill every position in this department with good and efficient teachers for $25 a month each"

Why not indeed? Why not get a number of unfortunate women to teach for $10, $8, nay, for $5 a month if possible? Why not turn out all the paid teachers and get "philanthropic ladies" who think it "such interesting work to hear the little dears say their lessons," to undertake to teach in the public schools. By all means reduce the salaries of the patient long suffering schoolmistresses who have earned the love and admiration of all the good mothers of San Francisco. Glorious news! The school system of San Francisco can be successfully carried out; lady teachers can be procured at $25 a month! We trust that before this "economy" is carried into execution, a pugilistic exhibition will be given at the American Theater for the benefit of the Board of Education, and subscription lists will be opened in all the rum shops in the city.

Scientifically Manufactured Milk.

The Bulletin is again on the war path in pursuit of the milkmen. It rejoices that the milk trade has been seriously injured by its anti-swill-milk editorials. It says:

"We are now informed that numbers of families which at one time purchased milk as it was offered to them, without knowing from whom it came or of what it consisted—whether compounded of chalk, whiting, drugs or putrid slops—have commenced keeping cows."

We rejoice with the Bulletin. "No family without a cow" is our motto. Let every mother of a family sell her piano and buy a cow. If there is no yard attached to the house, if the roof is flat let it be sown with grass and thus form a pasture for the cow who can be hoisted up to its elevated grazing ground by pullies. The Bulletin admits the fact that in some cases it is inconvenient, not to say impossible, for a family to have a private cow, and laments that the destruction of thousands of children from swill-milk still continues in consequence of the Courts having decided that the Board of Supervisors were not possessed of sufficient powers to prevent the feeding of cows on swill. The Bulletin confesses with grief that this is the case, but it says:

"A milkman may concoct a compound from chalk, rennet, or other deleterious ingredients, and sell it to whom he pleases, and it is doubtful whether he can be punished for so doing. There is no question but hundreds of gallons of milk are daily compounded in this city, saying nothing of that furnished by cows fed upon slops, garbage, etc., which is injurious for healthy men to consume, much more for small children. But what is to be done? Not one of these men can be punished under our lax system of administering the laws. In some countries simply selling milk diluted with pure water is punished by imprisonment and fine, but in enlightened San Francisco nothing can be done with a man who adulterates it with pernicious ingredients."

It begs our legislators, if they allow milkmen to poison children with swill-milk, to at least forbid the use of chalk! It concludes thus:

"If we cannot rid ourselves of the nauseous stuff furnished by slop fed animals, we should at least prohibit that made from chalk, etc"

The Bulletin should strenuously urge the passage of laws forbidding the adulteration of all articles of food, instead of grumbling at a little chalk. It is rather doubtful whether a milk manufacturer ever uses rennet, which the Bulletin terms a "deleterious ingredient," in making imitation milk. Rennet, which is the stomach of a calf, or the sour milk found in its stomach, is used in congulating milk for the purpose of making cheese. The Bulletin is not well informed in the art of manufacturing milk. The science is, as yet, in its infancy, but we may hope that the day is not far distant when wholesome, nutritious milk will be produced by scientific appliances, without the aid of a cow. We hear that Lucien Tracol, of Bourg Argental, near St. Etienne, has discovered a method of manufacturing silk, direct from the mulberry tree, without the intervention of the silkworm. This is as it should be. It is humiliating to think that in these days when science is making such gigantic strides, our silk dresses have all to pass through the bowels of a worm. Why should we submit to wait for our milk until it has gone through the inside of a cow? We will soon change all this. Vive la Science! A bas la Nature. We will produce our silk direct from the mulberry leaves, and our milk from grass How much stock is the Bulletin willing to take in a Patent Milk Company, which will turn out as good milk as was ever drawn from the most delicately fed Alderney? No chalk used! Pure milk laid on in pipes in every house. This company will probably be incorporated very shortly after the first "avitor" has made a trip from San Francisco to New York.

The Unfortunate Literary Critic of the Alta.

When the fox lost his tail in a trap, he did not run about calling the attention of his companions to his loss, but concealing it as far as possible by remaining seated strove to persuade them to cut their tails off. The literary critic of the Alta does not display the wisdom of the fox. We, in the "Lion's Mouth," last week called attention to a very gross error which was made by him. He wrote, Arcades est ambo. We asked:

"Was there no little boy commencing to learn Latin Grammar at hand to tell the literary critic of the Alta not to stick est in between Arcades and ambo, and thus say 'both Swinburne and Walt Whitman is Arcadians?' 'Blackguards both' was what he intended to say, and having some misty idea of 'Arcades ambo' being used to express that idea, he thought to show his classical knowledge by adding est"

The critic, instead of wisely remaining silent, declares that we showed "hypercriticism" in pointing out this error. He says;

"The 'Lion's Month' of the Californian, in commenting upon an erroneous quotation in this column—an error obvious enough not only in its grammatical but its metrical construction—unfortunately informs its readers that 'Arcades' means 'blackguards.' The critic should have obtained a safer knowledge of the quotation than that afforded by Byron's amusing translation:

'Arcades ambo, id est, blackguards both!'

There is a kind of hypercriticism which smacks less of the pedant than of the pupil, flushed with 'Andrews & Stoddard,' which we are sorry to see taking the place of honest criticism in the Californian. We trust, however, that 'the ladies will not be afeard of the lion.' Underneath the mask may be recognized 'Snug the Joiner' or 'Bottom the Weaver,' anxious to play the lion's part and assume his voice, but not altogether rid, perhaps, of the ass's head."

The error was indeed very obvious in this un-grammatical construction. We did not inform our readers that "Arcades" meant "blackguards"; we said that the critic intended to apply Arcades ambo in the sense of "blackguards both"—a sense in which it is indeed very frequently applied. We perceive that the literary critic of the Alta is better read in the English than in the Latin classics; therefore it would be as well if the next time he wished to quote Virgil he availed himself of a very excellent metrical translation by the late Mr. Dryden. Neither "Snug the Joiner," nor "Bottom the Weaver," is at present employed in joining and weaving rhymes for the CALIFORNIAN.

The Bulletin Squarely Expresses Itself in Favor of Negro Suffrage.

There has been too much beating about the bush, practiced by California newspapers with regard to negro suffrage. The Bulletin—the best paper in the State—has expressed itself squarely with reference to this question. It quite approves of the extension of the suffrage to the negroes of the District of Columbia. It says:

"It is, of course, obnoxious to a great majority of the white citizens: but emancipation and the extension to blacks of common privileges in public vehicles, were even more obnoxious, if possible, and as the Columbians become reconciled to these reforms they will soon learn not only to acquiesce in impartial suffrage, but to wonder that it ever appalled them."

Will the Bulletin now stand up boldly in favor of granting the right of suffrage to the many intelligent, well educated negroes who are residents in this State? The law has decided that the blacks have common privileges with the whites in public vehicles in this State. Will the Bulletin say that "as the Californians become reconciled to these reformers, they will soon learn not only to acquiesce in impartial suffrage, but to wonder that it ever appalled them?" If the Bulletin does this, we will believe in its honesty. It can scarcely claim that the negroes of the District of Columbia are better fitted by education to exercise the rights of suffrage than the peaceable, orderly, intelligent colored men resident in this State We shall see.

A Libel on Americans.

The Bulletin's lady correspondent in Paris is indignant at the manner in which Americans are libeled by English people. She says:

"When I was in London about a month ago I heard an English lady rail at what she called the United States people, and declare they were so disgusting in their habits that she thanked God she always crossed to Canada in a troop-ship and not a Cunard steamer, the deck of which, she alleged, is always covered with saliva. A number of persons present might have swallowed her statement had not the Paris correspondent of the London Daily News, who happened to be present, asserted that it was a very curious thing that he never yet saw an American spit, although at the places of the Ministers and Consuls above named he had met hundreds from nearly every city in the United States.

It was indeed a lucky circumstance that the Paris correspondent of the London Daily News happened to be present, and was able to state that "he never yet saw an American spit!" These English people who have so many national airs and glory in them, are constantly sneering at Americans, who they declare can always be distinguished from all other nationalities by their devotion to the spit-toon, the most favorite of Mational airs.

Religious Advertising.

We hate to treat religion—of any kind—in an irreverent spirit. We object to the following paragraph which appeared in that first-class morning paper, the Times, on Wednesday last, as tending to reduce professors of religion to the level of Japanese conjurers, learned pigs, tragic actors, Fenian lecturers, and other professionals.

"RELIGIOUS REVIVAL.—Rev. A B. Earle, the celebrated evangelist, arrived from Sacramento last evening. The revival in Sacramento has exceeded any such work on this coast, and still continues. Mr. Earle goes to Petaluma to-day to commence labor there to-night."

It doesn't seem to us exactly right to call Mr. A. B. Earle "the celebrated evangelist." "Evangelists" should not be advertised in exactly the same manner as circus performers.

A Committee of One.

At the last meeting of the Fenian Brotherhood in San Francisco a Center, a Secretary and a Treasurer were elected and seven persons were appointed as a "Committee of Safety." The great Head Center Stephens some little time ago appointed himself as a "Committee of Safety"—a committee of one, to provide for the safety of No 1. No report has as yet been received from this committee, but it is supposed that it has fully accomplished the object for which it formed itself.

Important to Printers.

J. J. Knowlton & Co., the advertising agents so well known to, and remembered by nearly all the newspaper proprietors in the State, advertise that they have received a large quantity of printers' ink which they will dispose of in quantities to suit. Considering the large quantities of ink which printers have used for the sole benefit of J. J. Knowlton & Co., we trust that this firm will dispose of their ink on liberal—if not equally liberal terms.

The Difference.

President Johnson's favorite political movement is "swinging round the circle." The Fenian Circle are at present anxious to get a chance to swing the Center.

HELIOTROPE.

TAKE those heliotropes away—
How I hate their purple bloom;
Fling the casement wide, I pray—
I'm faint with their perfume.

Cruel odors, born of tears!
Would you know what they recall?—
From the springtime of my years
Comes a dream of evenfall.

In a garden by the sea;
There's a new moon in the sky,
And the vine-leaves airily
Rustle o'er me where I lie.

And a figure, fair and light,
O'er the greensward seems to float:
Little maiden robed in white,
With those blossoms at her throat.

All their fragrance mingling with
That soft muslin's every fold:
With the thrillings of her breath,
And her hair's warm, rippling gold.

Oh, how blindly love believes!
I, to act its silly part:
Stealing from her breast the leaves,
To be hidden next my heart.

To be worn with prayers and tears:
Giving strength to eager hands
Through the labor of lone years
In the far and foreign lands.

Pah—their stifling, odorous weight!
Beaded knots of amethyst,
Spiced jewels that I hate!
False as were the lips I kiss'd!

Friend—if aught remains untold,
By those blossoms be it said,
Take them: in their purple fold.
Youth and hope and love lie dead.

CHAPTER VI.

HE paid his bill at the Amsterdam hotel and started for the Hague, where he remained for a fortnight, enjoying himself in the laziest and pleasantest manner, lounging in the picture gallery and the royal library, living remarkably well, smoking a great deal, and thinking about Clare Carruthers, and in odd half hours, after breakfast or before he went to bed, doing a little literary work, transcript of his day's observations, which he sent to the Mercury with a line to Grafton Leigh, telling him that private affairs had necessitated his coming abroad, but that when he returned he would keep the promise he had made of constant contributions to the paper; meanwhile, he sent a few sketches just to keep his hand in. In reply to this letter he received a communication from his friend Cunningham, telling him that his chief was much pleased with the articles, and would be glad, as George was so near, if he would go over to Amsterdam and write an account of the starting of the fleet for the herring-fishery—an event which was just about to come off, and which, owing to special circumstances at the time, excited a peculiar interest in England. In this letter, Cunningham enclosed another, which he said had been for some time lying at the office, and which, on opening, George found to be from the proprietors of the Piccadilly, presentiog their compliments to Mr. Paul Ward, stating that they were recommended by their "literary adviser," who was much struck by the brriliancy and freshness of so much of Mr. Paul Ward's serial story as had been sent in, to accept that story for their magaziue, regretting that Mr. Ward's name was not yet sufficiently well-known to enable them to give him the sum he had named as his price, but offering him, on the whole, very handsome terms.

So, it has come at last! No longer to struggle on, a wretched outsider, a component of the "ruck" in the great race for name, and fame, and profit, but one of the select, taking the leading place in the leading periodical of the day, with the chance, if fortune favored him, and he could only avail himself of the opportunity so long denied, and call into action the influences so long prompting him, of rendering himself from month to month an object of interest, a living something, an actual necessity to thousands of people whose faces he should never see, and who would yet know of him and look with the deepest interest on the ideal creatures of his fancy. Honor, wealth, fame, love! not all your riches, Capel Carruthers, not your country position, not your territorial influence, not your magisterial dignity, nor anything else on which you pride yourself, shall be half as sweet to you as the dignified pride of the man who looks around him, and seeing himself possessed of all these enviable qualities, says; "By my own hand, by the talent which God has given me, and by his help alone, unaided by birth, or riches, or influence, I have made myself what I am!" The crisis in George Dallas' life had arrived, the ball was at his feet, and with the opportunity so urgent oo him, all his desultoriness, all his lazy dilettanteism vanished. He felt at last that life was real and earnest, and determined to enter upon it at ouce. With what big schemes his heart was filled, with what quixotic dreams his brain was bursting! In his own mind his triumphant position in the future was so assured, that he could not resist taking an immediate foretaste of his happiness, and so on the very day of the receipt of Cunningham's letter a box containing some very rare Japanese fans, screens and china, was dispatched anonymously, addressed to Miss Carruthers. The cost of these trifles barely left George Dallas enough to pay his fare back to Amsterdam. But what of that? Was he not on the high road to fortuue, and could he not make money as he liked?

At Amsterdam the polyglot waiter placed in his hands a letter which had been more than a week awaiting him. George glanced at its superscription, and a shadow crossed his face as he recognised Routh's hand-writing. He had looked upon that connection as so completely cut assunder, than he had forgotton his last communication necessitated a reply—an acknowledgement of the receipt of the money at least—and he opened the letter with an undefined sensation of annoyance. He read as follows:

S. M. Street, June—' 18—.

"Your letter, my dear George, and its enclosure is 'to hand.' I am ten years older than you in years and thirty years in experience, and I know what heart-burnings and worries, not merely for yourself alone, but for others very, very dear to you, you have had in raising this money which you have sent to me, You thought it a debt of honor, and consequently moved Heaven and earth to discharge it, and you knew that I was hard up—a fact which had an equally irritating effect upon you. As to the honor——Well, not to mince matters, it was a gambling debt, purest simple; and when I reflect, as I do sometimes—Harriet knows that, and will tell you so—I know well enough that but for me you would never have been led into gambling. And then, as to my being hard up, I don't mind telling you—of course in the strictest confidence—that Tokenhouse-yard is a tremendous success! It was a tight time some months ago, and no mistake; but I think we have weathered the storm, and the money is rolling in there splendidly: so splendidly and so rapidly that—again in the strictest confidence—I am thinking of launching out a little and taking up the position which—you'll know I'm not bragging, old boy—my birth and education warrant me in assuming. I have grovelled on long enough, Heaven knows, and I want to see myself, and, above all, I want to see my wife out of the reach of—Well, I need not dilate to you on what circumstances have lowered us to, and what we will now float above. So, as good luck is nothing unless one's friends share in it, I want to say to you, as delicately as I can, 'Share in mine!' Don't be in a hurry to send me back that money, don't be too proud—that's not the word, George—I should say don't fear to remain in my debt, and, if occasion should arise, let me be your banker for further sums. I can stand the racket, and shall be only too glad to be called upon to do so,as some slight way of atoniug for having led you into what cannot be looked upon by anyone, I am afraid, as a reputable life. I won't say any more on this head, because there is no need. You will know that I am in earnest in what I have said, and you will receive the fifty pounds which I have enclosed herein in the spirit io which they are sent—that of true friendship. You will be a great gun some day, if you fulfill the promise made for you by those who ought to know about it; and then you will repay me. Meanwhile, depend on it that any draft of your's on me will be duly honored.

"And so you are not coming back to London for sometime? It seems an ungenerous thing in a friend to say, but upon my soul I think it the wisest thing you can do is to remain abroad, and widen your knowledge of life. You have youth and health, at your time of life the powers of observation are at their freshest and strongest, all you want is money, and that you shan't want, if you accede to the suggestion I have just made. You will store your mind in experience, you will see all sorts and varieties of men, and as you have nothing particular to bind you to England, you could thoroughly enjoy your freedom, and return with a valuable stock of ideas for the future benefit of the British reading public. Allez toujours, la jeuneise! which, under its familiar translation of 'Go it while you're young!' is the best advice I can give you George, my dear boy. During your absence, you will have shaken off all your old associations,and who knows but that the great bashaw, your step-father, may clasp you to his bosom, and leave all his acres to his dearly beloved step son, G. D.? Only one thing! You must not forget Harry, and you must not forget me! If all works right, you will find us very differently situated from what you have ever known us, and you won't be ashamed to recognise us as friends. You would laugh if you could see me now, solemnly rebuking my young clerks for late attendance at the office, and comporting myself generally with the greatest gravity and decorum. And to think what we once used to be. Tell it not in Gath! 'By advices last received,the produce of the mines has been twenty-two thousand oitavas, the gain whereof is, etc., etc.' That's the style now!

"Harriet is well, and, as ever, my right hand. To see her at work over the books at night, one would think she had been born in the Brazils, and had never heard of anything but silver mines. She sends kindest regards, and is fully of my opinion as to the expediency of your staying away from London. No news of Deane; but that does not surprise me. His association with us was entirely one of concurrence, and he always talked of himself as a wanderer—a bird of passage. I suppose he did not give you any hint of his probable movements on the day of the dinner, when I had the ill-luck to offend him by not coming? No one ever knew where he lived, or how, so I can't make any inquiries. However, it's very little matter.

"And now I must make an end of this long story. Good-by, my dear George. All sorts of luck and jollity, and happiness attend you, but in the enjoyment of them all don't forget the pecuniary proposition I have made to you, and think sometimes kindly of "Your sincere

"STEWART ROUTH."

A little roll of paper had dropped from the letter when George opened it. He picked it up, and found two Bank of England notes for twenty pounds and one for ten pounds.

George Dallas was but a man, very warm hearted, very impressionable, and when he read Stewart Routh's letter he repented of his harshness to his friend, and accused himself of having been precipitate and ungenerous. Here was the blackleg, the sharper, the gambler, actually returning some of his legitimate winnings, and placing his purse at his acquaintance's disposal, while his step father——But then that would not bear thinking about! Besides, his step father was Clare's uncle; no kindness of Routh's would ever enable him George, to make progress in that direction, and therefore—— And yet it was deuced kind in Routh to be so thoughtful. The money came so opportunely, too, just when, with his Hague excursion and his purchases, he had spent the balance of the sum derived from the sale of the bracelet, and it would have been scarcely decent to ask for an advance from the Mercury office or the Piccadilly people. But it was a great thing that Routh advised him to keep away from England for a time—a corroboration, too, of Routh's statement that he was going into a different line of life—for of course with his new views an intimacy with Routh would be impossible, whereas he could now let it drop quietly. He would accept the money so kindly sent him, and would do the account of the herring fishery for the Mercury, and he would get on with the serial story for the Piccadilly, and—Well, he would remain where he was and see what turned up. The quiet, easy-going, dreamy life suited George to a nicety; and if he had been a little older, and had never seen Clare Carruthers, he might, on very little provocation, have accepted the Dutch fair niente as the realisation of human bliss.

So, having to remain in Holland for some few days longer, and needing some money for immediate spending, George Dallas bethought him of his old friend Mr. Schaub, and strolled to the Muiderstraat to see him.

"Vat! you here still? You not back gone to your own land, Vart? You do no more vairks, Vart, you vaste your time in Amsterdam—Paul Vart!"

"No; not that," said George, laughing; "I have not gone home, certainly, but I have not lost my time. I've been seeing to your country and studying character. I've been to the Hague, and I dare say I shall be able to make something of what I saw there. You'll be pleased to hear I am going to write a story for the Piccadilly—they've engaged me."

"Wass Peek a-teelies was goot," said Mr. Schaub; "better as Mercury—bigger, higher, more stand!"

"Ah! but you mustn't run down the Mercury, either. They've asked me to write a description of the sailing of your herring fleet. So I must stop here for a few days, and I want you to change me a Bank of England note."

"Ja, ja! with pleasure! Wass always likes dis Bank of England notes; ist goot, and clean, and so better as dirty Austrish Prussich money. Ah! he is not the same as I give you other day! He is quite new and clean for twenty pounds! Ja, ja," he added after holding the note up to the light, "his vater-mark is raight! A. F.! Vot is A. F., 17 April? Ah, you don't know! You don't become it from A. F.? Of course not! Vell, vell let me see die course of 'Change—denn I put him into my leetle stock von English bank note!"

The old man took up a newspaper that lay on the counter before him and consulted it, made a rapid calculation on a piece of paper, and was about to turn round toward the drawer where, as George remembered, he kept his cash-box, when he stopped, handed George the pen from behind his ear, dipped it into the ink, and said:

"Vell, just write his name, Vart—Paul Vart, on his back —And his date of month. So! Vart—Paul Vart!—ist goot! Here's die guldens."

George Dallas swept the gold pieces into his pocket,nodded to the old man, aud left the shop. Mr. Schaub carefully locked away the note, made an entry of its number and amouut in his ledger, and resumed his reading.

CHAPTER VII.—A DILEMMA

South Molton street had apparently a strong attraction for Mr. James Swain. He would hang about the precincts of the house in which Routh and Harriet lodged, and evinced an extraordinary preference for the archway in the vicinity as a dining-room. He might have been seen at irregular hours devouring hunches of bread and cheese, within the shelter of the archway, in the most unsophisticated attitudes, and with great apparent enjoyment. Mr. James Swain's face was not free from the underlying expression of care and anxiety which is always to be found by the careful observer in the countenance of the London street-boy, but it had more than the usual complement of sauciness, cunning, readiness, and impudence.

The boy had quite an attraction for Mrs. Routh, who would smile at him when she passed him in the street, nod pleasantly to him occasionally from her window, and frequently sent him of errands, for the doing which she rewarded him with a liberality which appeared to him astounding munificence. Mr. James Swain was of a temperament to feel kindness, neglected street-boy though he was, and he had been wonderfully impressed by the womanly compassion which had spoken to him in Harriet's gentle tones on the morning of their first meeting and had looked out of all the trouble and foreboding in her blue eyes. His interest in the Routh household, however, antedated that event, and received not only an additional access, but a fresh coloring from it, and an acute observer would have seen an evidently struggle of some sort was going on in the mind of the frequenter of South Molton street, and the seeker of odd jobs.

Routh, also, was not without interest for Jim Swain. Perhaps he watched him even more closely than he watched Harriet, but if he did. it was with totally different feelings. Routh had considerable powers of self command, and could always be civil and apparently good tempered, no matter what his real humor might be, when it accorded with his interests to be so. But he was not a man to treat inferiors with courtesy, or to refrain from rudeness and brutality where they were safe, aud unlikely to do him any discredit. Consequently, servants and other recipients of the outporiugs of his temper hated him with a vivid cordiality. Jim, the street-boy, had been employed by him occasionally, and had formed, apart from certain other knowledge he had gained concerning Mr. Stewart Routh, the worst opinion of that gentleman's dispositiou and character.

"He's a bad'un, anyhow," the boy muttered, as he watched Mr Routh letting himself into the house he iuhabited with his latch-key, having previously taken a handful of letters from a postman at the door. "An ill-lookin' dog, too. Scowled at the letters," as if he was agoin' to eat 'em. P'raps they're love-letters. I shouldn't wonder. now, as the lady is a pinin' for some 'un else, and he's jealous, and gets hold on all the letters to catch her out."

This bright idea, which Jim Swain derived from his habitual reading of penny romances, devoted to the delineation of the tender passion, afforded him considerable gratification, and he had already consumed several minutes and a cold sausage while turning it over in his mind, when Harriet Routh came out of the house, and passed him, as he leaned against the wall under the archway. She was very pale and quite absorbed in thought, so that, though the lad respectfully pulled a tuft of his tousled hair in salutation, she did not perceive his presence.

"She's not like the same woman," mused Mr. James Swain; "she's gone as white as anything; looks just as if she'd had to get her own livin' for ever so long, and lound it precious hard to git, too. If he's jealous of her, and a ill treatin' of her, blowed if I won't peach! No, no, I won't, though, leastways not yet, 'cause I can't without lettin' out on myself, too; but," said the boy, with a long look which softened the cunning of his face strangely, "I would like to know as she was happier than I think she is."

In the wide city of London there was not another human being to feel any such wish in connection with Harriet Routh. She was quite alone. She had so willed it, and circumstauces had aided her inclination and her resolve. In the life which her husband had adopted, and she had accepted, iutimacies, friendships, were impossible. The only relation between them and their kind was the relation between the swindler and his dupes, always a merely "business" connection, aud generally very brief in its duration. Harriet had not a female friend in the world. Her husband's male friends saw her seldom, and were not observant or interested in the health, spirits, or appearance of any but themselves; so there was no one but the street-boy to note the change that had passed upon her. Routh, indeed, observed it; with the bitter, selfish impatience of his character, and silently resented it. But only silently: he made no comment, and Harriet, for the first time, failed to nterpret his feelings.

She was changed. Changed in face, in manner, in voice, in the daily habits of her life. The light had faded from her blue eyes, and with it their color had paled. Her cheek had lost its roundness, aud there was something set and stony in her face. It had been calm, now it was rigid. Her voice, still low and refined, was no longer musical. and her words were rare. Personal habits are tenacious, and rarely yield, even to strong mental excitement, or under the pressure of anxious care, and Harriet, always neat and careful in her simple dress, was neat and careful still. But a close observer would have marked the change even in this respect. She cared for her looks no longer. An ill-assorted ribbon, or ill chosen color, would once have been impossible to Harriet Routh; but it was all the same to her now. What were the symptoms of the moral change that had passed upon her as distinctly as the physical? They were rather those of intensification than of alteration. Her determination had assumed a sternness which had not before marked it, her identification of herself with Routh had become more than ever complete. The intensity of the passion with which she loved him was hardly capable of increase, but its quiet was gone.

She had been much alone of late. Routh had been much and profitably occupied. The affairs of the new company were progressing favorably, and Routh's visits to Flinders were frequent and well received. He had other things of the sort on hand, and his finances were in a flourishing condition. He was on the road to success, after the fashion of modern successes, and if his luck did not change, all the respectability which attaches to a fortunate speculation was on the cards for Stewart Routh. No restoration to his former place was possible, indeed; but Routh cared nothing for that, would, perhaps, not have accepted such a restoration had it been within his reach. Struggle, scheming, shifts, and the excitement consequent thereon, were essential to him now; he liked them; the only game he could play, with any relish was the desperate one. To what extent he had played it was known only to himself and Harriet, and he was beginning to be afraid of his confederate. In all that concerned the business of Stewart Routh's life, Harriet's conduct was still the same as before—she was still industrious and invaluable to him. But the occupations which had filled her leisure hours were all neglected now, the lonely time was no more lightened by the pursuits which her early education and her natural tastes had endeared and rendered habitual to her. One of two moods now possessed her,either uncontrollable restlessness or absorbed brooding. She would start off, when Routh had left her, and walk for hours through the crowded thoroughfare, out into the suburbs of London, or up and down the most distant and least-frequented parts of the Parks, returning home weary and footsore, but with torturing sense of restlessness unsubdued. Or, when she was alone, she would sit for hours, not in a selected position of comfort, but anywhere, on the first seat that came in her way, her head drooping, her eyes fixed and vacant, her hands closely clasped and lying in her lap, her fair low brow contracted by a stern painful frown. From either of these two moods she rarely varied; and even in Routh's presence, one or the other would master her at times. It chanced that on the day when Jim Swain had seen Routh return to his lodgings, and take some letters from the postman, the restless fit had come very strongly upon Harriet, and she had gone to her room to dress herself for walking, when Routh unexpectedly returned. He went into the sitting room, and concluding she would be down stairs presently, waited for her, reading the letters in his hand frowningly the while. But Harriet had passed quietly down the stairs and gone out, without re-entering the sitting-room, and Routh waited in vain. At length he sought her in her room, and not finding her, he angrily rang the bell, and asked the servant if she knew anything about her. She did not, and Routh dismissed her, and began to stride about the room, uttering very uncalled-for objurgations on women who were never in the way when they were wanted. As he passed the window, his eye fell upon Jim Swain tranquilly eating bread and cheese, as he leaned against the opposite railings. Routh looked at him again more closely, and again; finally, he took up his hat, went down stairs, out of the door, and across the street, close up to the boy.

"Hollo, you sir!" he addressed him roughly. "What are you doing here?"

Mr. James Swain eyed his questioner with no pleasant or grateful expression of countenance, aud replied, curtly:

"Nothin'!"

"What brings you here, then?" continued Routh.

"I ain't a doin' you any harm, am I?" answered the boy, all his native impudence brought out in a moment by the overbearing manner of Routh. "It ain't your street, I believe, nor yet your archway, as I knows on; and if I choose to odd job on this here lay, I don't hurt you, do I?"

The saucy manner of the lad did not anger Routh; he hardly seemed to notice it, but appeared to be entirely possessed by some struggling remembrance not of a pleasing kind, if his expression afforded any correct clue to it.

"Have you seen a lady come out of No. 60 since you have been about here?" he asked, passing by the boy's saucy remarks as if he had not heard them.

"Yes, I have. I saw the lady as lives there, not two minutes after you came in. She went that way." And he pointed down the street.

"Had she anything in her hand? Did she look as if she was going out for a walk, or out shopping?"

"She hadn't no basket or bag, and she warn't partickler dressed; not as nice as she dressed sometimes. I should say," continued Mr. Jim Swain, with an air of wisdom and decision, "as she was goin' for a constitootional, all by herself, and uot to shop nor nothin'."

Routh's attention had wandered from the boy's words and was fixed upon his face.

"Have I ever seen you before?" he asked him, abruptly.

A sudden rush of color dyed Mr. James Swain's face, even through the varnish of dirt which hid its surface, as he replied with a little less than his customary boldness:

"Yes, sir, you've seen me, though in course you ain't likely to remember it. You've giv' me many a penuy, and a sixpence too, and the lady."

Again Routh looked steadily, but covertly, at him under his thick brows. He was evidently eager to ask him some question, but he refrained, restrained by some powerful motive. Jim looked uneasily up and down the street, moved his feet about restlessly, turned his ragged pockets inside out, letting loose a multitude of dirty crumbs, and displayed a fidgety inclination to get away from South Molton street.

"Well," said Routh, rousing himself from his abstraction, "we're going to move next week, and you can come and do the odd jobs for us. if you like."

"Thankee, sir," said Jim, who was very respectful now, and touched his ragged cap as if he had quite altered his opiuion of the speaker.

"What day shall I come, sir?"

"I don't exactly know," said Routh; "you can call and ask the lady." And then he gave the lad a shilling, to Jim Swain's intense surprise, and, crossing the street, once more let himself in at the door of No. 60. Having reached the sitting-room, Stewart Routh sat down by the window and fell into a fit of musing as deep as those in which Harriet Routh passed hours away.

Mr. James Swain went briskly down the street, pleasautly eouscious that the unexpected windfall of the shilling had released him from the labors of his calling for the day, and determined to proceed at once to lay it out to the greatest advantage.

"Wotever is he up to now?" Thus ran the street-boy's thoughts. "I'm sure he's jealous, or he wouldn't be coming home unexpected, and a watchin' of her like that. Ain't he a brute just? And a willin too? Well, I'm glad I ain't sure—I'm very glad I ain't sure."

With this enigmatical phrase, Mr. James Swain abandoned his mental colloquy, and directed his thoughts to more immediately personal matters.

Routh was still sitting by the window when Harriet returned, and with the first glance at his face she saw that something new had occurred.

"I did uot expect you home until six o'clock," she said, as she laid aside her bonnet, and stood by his side, laying her hand tenderly upon his shoulder.

"No," he returned; "I came home to get some papers for Flinders about the Tunbridge Canal business; but you have them, Harry, and you were out."

"Well?" she said, calmly, looking at him with questioning eyes. "What has happened, Stewart?"

"This," he returned, slowly, and without meeting her gaze. "As I came in I met the postman with this letter. Read it, aud tell me what is to be done."

She sat down close beside him, and took the letter he held toward her. It was addressed to George Dallas, to the care of Routh, and it was, in fact, the letter which Mr. Carruthers had written to step-son prior to his departure from Poynings. As Harriet read, her right hand sought her husband's, and held it tightly. The old look of quiet resolution, the old expression of confident resource, came into her face. She read the paper twice before she spoke.

"Stewart," she said, "this is only another head of the hydra, and we had counted them, had we not? What we have to decide is, whether this letter shall be suppressed, or whether it must be forwarded to Georgo Dallas. At first sight, I see no possibility of suppressing it without infinite danger, but this is only first sight, and we may see more clearly afterwards."

"Dallas has never said anything to you about letters from his mother, has he?" asked Routh.

"No," replied Harriet, "not since his second letter, when he said he supposed she was testing his repentance and good conduct, and that he would not write until he could give her some proof of both."

"Get the old woman's letter, and let us read it again."

Harriet went to her writing-table, opened a drawer, and took a paper from its recesses. It was the letter which Mrs. Brookes had written to George Dallas. The two read it carefully, aud Harriet spoke first.

"We can only conjecture the meaning of this, Stewart;

but, as I make it out, it means that the proceedings at the--inquest"—she paused almost imperceptibly, then went on, in a steady tone--"awakened his mother's fears It was lucky he told us the story of his mother's anxiety about his coat, or we should have failed to catch the clue. Now I read the riddle thus: Mrs. Carruthers has been dangerously ill in consequence of the shock of the discovery, but she has not betrayed her knowledge or suspicions. A good deal of time has been gained, and under any circumstances that is a priceless advantage. The question now is, can any more time be gained? Can George Dallas be kept in ignorance of the appearances against him any longer? The suppression of the old woman's letter was an easy matter. It is ill-written, you see, as servant's letters usually are, indistinctly addressed, and generally unimportant. But a letter written by Mr. Carruthers of Poynings is quite another matter. It must come out, some time or other, that it was not received, and he is precisely the man to investigate the matter to the utmost. No, no, the letter must be sent to Dallas."

She spoke firmly, but her eyes were dreamy and distant. Routh knew their expression, and that some expedient, some resolve, was shaping itself in her mind. He sat quite silent until she spoke again.

"The first thing we have to do is to ascertain with all possible exactitude the real condition of Mrs. Carruthers, where she is at present, and whether we are right in supposing her fears were excited. This letter is not calculated to bring George home, I think. Of course, if it had reached him before they left Poynings, he would have come at once; but, see, Mr. Carruthers writes on the 10th, and says they are to start on the 11th. This is the 13th. What is the postmark?"

"Dover," said Routh, handing her the envelope.

"Posted after they left England, no doubt," said Harriet. "Stewart, there is just one thing to be done. Let us move from this at once. It is only doing so a little sooner than we had intended. Then, if we decide on suppressing the letter, its loss may be accounted for, even to the satisfaction of Mr. Carruthers. This while we consider what must be done."

"Yes," said Routh, "I think that will be wise; but I do not see my way out of the danger of his return, if he returns when he has received the letter. He will go down to Amherst at once, and will discover the suspicion, and at once take steps to clear himself of it."

"Perhaps so," said Harriet, and her face darkened. "But he may not find that so easy. I hope he will not put himself into the danger; but if he does--" She paused, and looked thoughtfully into her husband's face, while a quick shudder crept over her. He saw the look in her eyes, he felt the quiver in her hand, and frowned darkly.

"Don't take to melodrama, Harriet, it's so unlike you, and doesn't suit you. Besides it's too late in the day for that kind of thing now."

She took no notice of the ungracious speech, but still stood looking thoughtfully at him. He rose, letting her hand drop from his shoulder, and walked up and down the room.

"Stewart," she said, gently, "you must not be impatient with me if I am not as ready of resource as I was. However, I think I see what ought to be done in this emergency, and I am quite sure I can do it. I will go to Amherst, find out the true state of things there, see the old woman at Poynings, who will gladly receive me as a friend of George Dallas, and then, and then only, can we decide whether this letter is to reach him or not."

"By Jove! Harry, that's a splendid idea," said Routh, "and there can't be any risk in it, for Dallas would take your doing it as the greatest kindness. You not so ready of resource as you were? You're more so, my girl—you're more so."

There was a little wonder in the look she turned upon him, a little surprise at the lightness of his tone, but not a ray of the pleasure which his perverted praise had once given her.

"This is the best thing to do," she said, gravely, "and I will do it at once I will go to-morrow morning."

"And I will get our traps moved, and put up at the Tavistock till you come back. You can pack this evening, I suppose, Harry?"

"Oh yes," she answered. "I shall be glad of this occupation."

"And you'll do it more easily without me," said Routh, whom no crisis of events, however serious, could render indifferent to his individual comforts, and to whom the confusion of packing was an image of horror and disgust, "so I shall dine out, and leave you to your own devices. Here, you had better lock these up." He took the letters from a table on which she had laid them as she spoke, and held them towards her.

She drew a step nearer to him, took the papers from his hand, then suddenly let them drop upon the floor, and flung her arms wildly round Routh's neck.

"Harriet, Harriet," he said "what's this?" as he strove to lift her face, which she held pressed against his breast with terrible force. She answered him with a groan—a groan so full of anguish, that his callousness was not proof against it.

"My love, my darling, my brave girl, don't don't!" was all he could say, as he bent his head over her, and held her tightly to him. For several moments she stood thus; then she lifted her white face, put up her hands and drew his face down to hers, kissed him with kisses which thrilled him with an unknown sense of fear and doom, and instantly releasing, left him.

Mr. James Swain got the promised old job in South Molton-street sooner than he had expected it, for calling at No. 60, according to Mr. Routh's instructions, to ask the lady when his services would be required, he was informed that she had gone away, and he was to carry down the boxes to be conveyed to their destination in the van then standing at the door. Jim performed his duty with a perturbed spirit.

"Gone away, is she?" he said, over and over again. "Now I should like to know where she's gone, and wot for. I hope he ain't be up to nothin' agin her, but I don't trust him, and I ain't a goin to loose sight of him for longer then I can help, if I knows it, until she's safe back *some*wheres."

"That funeral is largely attended for a small town," said Harriet Routh to the waiter at the inn at Amherst, who was laying the cloth for her dinner. She was sitting by a window on the ground floor, and idly watching the decorous procession as it passed along the main street, to the huge admiration of gaping boys and gossiping nursemaids.

"Yes, ma'am," replied the man, gladly seizing the opportunity of approaching the window, and having a peep on his own account.

"He was very much respected, was old Mr. Evans; no one in the town more so. He gave the best of measures, and used the best of materials, and a charitable man, not a constanter at meetin', though uncommon deaf latterly, ain't in Amherst."

Harriet looked inquiringly at the speaker.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am, you're a stranger, of course, and don't know nothin' about poor old Evans. He were a tailor, ma'am, at Amherst, man and boy, for fifty year and more, and got a deal of custom, which they do say no tailor here won't have for the future, seein' as they can't compete with the Sydenham suits."

Harriet made no comment upon the man's little discourse, and he left the room. When she was alone, she smiled a smile not good to see, and said, half aloud:

"I remember how they used to talk about Providence, and providential interventions on behalf of the good, long ago, when I used to fancy I believed in Providence, and when I certainly did believe in the existence of the good. I wonder what these people would call this? If it is a providential intervention, the theory has two sides."

THE FOUNDRIES OF SAN FRANCISCO.

We presume that few of the vast number of strangers who annually visit our City ever think of including among the metropolitan curiosities worthy of being included in their sight seeing round the extensive iron foundries of San Francisco—unless indeed they are directly interested in the business, and have orders for machinery and engine work to be filled for different parts of the State, or for the adjacent Territories. Yet these foundries and machine shops, of which we have some fifteen or twenty, including brass foundries, are well worth the examination of the intelligent and curious stranger. Among the most extensive and noteworthy of these establishments are the "Miners,'" the "Fulton," and the "California" foundries, all of which are now busily engaged in casting iron fronts for the new Merchants Exchange, Pacific Insurance Company, and Murphy, Grant & Co.'s new building corner of Sansome and Bush streets, besides filling orders for the country. Over one thousand men are employed in these foundries in the moulding and casting departments alone. Among the brass foundries are those of W. T. Garratt and Gallagher & Weed. These two are busy casting Steamboat and City Fire Department work. Meantime the boiler makers (including the Neptune and Portland works) are doing a large amount of business for Steamers, and also for quartz and flour mills. Theodore Kollenbergh has been employed by the Mint authorities with the designing and manufacture of all the work required by the Branch Mint of this City; and his establishment at 416 Market street is exclusively devoted to the designing and construction of mechanical, philosophical, and inventors' models. Probably there is no city in the United States where better work of this kind can be turned out, than in San Francisco. Certainly no city of the same size can pretend to compete with us in this field.

A Complete skeleton of the North American Mastodon has been unearthed at Cohoes, New York. All the essential parts of the frame seem to be at hand. Careful measurements of scientific gentlemen who had examined the remains, show that they belong to an animal that must have stood at least fifteen feet high, and measured some twenty odd feet in length, independent of the tusks, which of themselves are eight feet long.

There are water leaves in the lakes of Brazil forty feet long and fifteen feet wide.

AMUSEMENTS.

Maguire's Opera House.—Lady Don's engagement closed on Wednesday evening, when she took a benefit, playing in Sweethearts and Wives and the farce of Brother Bob. Lady Don took her departure for the East on the steamer of the 10th inst., having had no reason to feel dissatisfied with her success in California. On Thursday evening, Charles Reade's dramatization of his novel, It is Never too Late to Mend, was produced. This drama was placed on the stage in admirable style. The mechanical effect, scenery and music, were all perfect. The first scene representing an English farm-yard was very well arranged, the chickens, the pigeons, the dog and the horse, appeared quite up in their parts and acted better than did some others who had been longer on the stage. The drama as a literary production, will serve as a warning to clever novelists who may fancy that because they can write novels which people read with pleasure, they are therefore capable of writing plays which will be listened to patiently. A great portion of the dialogue in this play is very stupid and tedious George Pauncefort played the part of "George Fielding" very neatly. Henry Edwards was extremely clever in his impersonation of "Thomas Robinson," and Harry Jackson made the most of the comic part of "Peter Crawley." Mrs. Harry Jackson played the character of "Josephs" beautifully, bringing out the pathetic points in a manner which affected the sensibilities of the audience. Miss Julia Corcoran made an interesting "Susan Merton," and the other parts were filled satisfactorily. The Farm Yard, the Rocky Glen with waterfall and rivulets by moonlight, and the concluding scene were extremely beautiful Mr. Graves deserves great credit for the manner in which he produced this drama. It will be repeated this afternoon and evening. On Monday evening Miss Jennie Parker, who arrived from New York by the last steamer, will commence an engagement opening in The Colleen Bawn. Miss Jennie Parker has arrived here unheralded by mammoth bills—she may prove another Elfin Star Angels' visits come unawares.

The St. Joseph's Church Concert.—Benefit concerts are too often got up in such a manner as to afford but little satisfaction to those who attend them, save that which they derive from the consciousness that the money which they have spent, will be devoted to a good purpose. Those who were present at the concert given for the benefit of St. Joseph's Church and School, at Platt's Hall, on Thursday evening, could not flatter themselves that they had bestowed much money in charity. The concert given on this occasion was good in every particular. M. Joseph Heine, the Blind Paganini, and Mme. Heine, the accomplished pianiste, volunteered their services for this concert; the fine soprano singer, Miss Emma Howson, and the charming contralto, Miss Clelia Howson, also gave their valuable services. The concert was an immense success. M. Joseph Heine's performance of Wianiawski's Russian airs, roused the audience to a pitch of enthusiasm seldom called forth by instrumental music. M. Heine's violin playing is so wonderfully sympathetic; his touch is so delicate; his bowing so extraordinary that all confess the presence of an artiste and a genius. Mme. Ada Heine, in spite of the disadvantage of a square instead of a grand piano having been provided, astonished all present by her wonderful execution of intricate pieces of music. The favorite tenor, Henri Herberte, on this occasion sang Cherry's famous descriptive song entitled "Will-o'-the Wisp," to which we have before referred, and also his celebrated song "The Anchor's weighed," which won him a triple encore. Altogether this concert was a grand success. The quartettes, by Messers. Wunderlich, Swift, Norblom and McCabe, were attractive features in the programe, and received the applause which they merited.

The Alemannia Masquerade Ball.—The Alemannia masquerade ball last year, was noted for the splendor of the costumes, the unexceptionably good conduct of those present, the fine music and the tasteful decorations of the ball-room. The utmost circumspection is exercised by this Association to the end that the Alemannia masquerade balls may be free from the objectionable features too often observable in these entertainments This year's ball which is announced to take place at Platt's Hall on Saturday evening, promises to be one of the most fashionable affairs of the season. The Hall has been beautifully decorated for this occasion by Messrs. A. & T. Torning, at an expense of over $1,000.

Maguire's Academy of Music.—Those who witnessed the performances of the first troupe of Japanese gymnasts, believed that their feats could not be surpassed. The Imperial Troupe have eclipsed their predecessors, In conjuring tricks, feats of strength and gymnastic performances, they surpass any other performers in the known world. Night after night the Academy is crowded from pit to dome, to see these artistes who have now, for the first time in three thousand years, left their country.

Metropolitan Theatre.—The pantomime of Mazulm, with its wonderful tricks and transformations, has proved a hit. The new ballet divertisement of the Prima Donna, is very beautiful. The Howsons and Willie Edouin have performed several farces in admirable style. The Magic Pill is in preparation.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

A FRESH BATCH OF "CALIFORNIA POETRY."

"POETRY of the Pacific; Selections and Original Poems from the Poets of the Pacific States, Edited by May Wentworth" is the title of a volume of some four hundred pages, which we find upon our book table. The volume bears the imprint of a mysterious association, styling itself the "Pacific Publishing Company, 305 Montgomery street," of the existence of which we were not before aware. Some seventy "California poets" are represented in the book, the great majority of whom are quite unknown even to our local public as writers. All the poetry contained in the volume, might have been printed upon fifty pages, the remainder consisting of verses of various grades of excellence, from such as every person of moderate culture and sensibility can indite for ladies' albums, to such ineffable twaddle as the following:

"A REVERIE."

BY WASHINGTON AYER, M. D.

When starry light the azure fills
With voiceless melody,
And moonbeams melt upon the hills,
And quiver on the sea.

Alone I tread the busy streets,
Unmindful where I be,
As then my heart in sadness beats,
Life seems so strange to me.

And yet some weird emotion thrills
The heart once full of glee,
And leads me far o'er slumbering hills,
Beyond bright lakes and sea.

And there the sportive scenes of youth—
Those spectres of the past,
Come dancing 'round my path forsooth,
In fleecy shadows cast;—

And lead me where the fern is gray,
Through pastures bright and green,
Where violets along the way
And buttercups are seen.

Again o'er dimpled hills I stray,
Along the shady mead,
And chase the butterfly away,
Upon my willow steed.

But oh! what dreamy spell is this?
What waude ing of the mind?
My early sports and youthful bliss
Leave but this dream behind.

Then up! by daily toil beguiled!
Nor slumber by the stream,
Where phantoms lead the simple child
In innocence to dream.

Life is at best a lingering death,—
A journey not of miles,—
And hope, the only rainbow wreath,
Is wrought of tears and smiles.

The labor of the fleeting years
Is all we have to give:
Then up! and drive away the fears,
And dying, learn to live!

The editress has performed her task of selection, in a far more Catholic spirit than that by which Mr. Harte was guided in compiling his Outcroppings, and she has not been restrained by any excess of fastidiousness from giving a place and a hearing even to the most inferior verse writers whose productions have appeared in the daily papers. Her selections from Pollock, Lyman Goodman, and several others, have been more liberal and more judicious than those of Mr. Harte, and the poems by these writers, and by Emily Lawson, Ina D. Coolbrith, and Frank Soule, which the volume contains are of themselves amply worth its price. Its value, however, would be enhanced rather than diminished by the omission of at least two thirds of its actual contents, consisting as it does for the most part of verses utterly destitute of poetic merit of any kind. To the writers above named, and also to Isabel Saxon, a much larger proportionate space should have been given; but the compiler seems to have been actuated by a good natured desire to gratify the vanity of the entire mob of our indigenous rhymsters by allowing them to see their names and productions in a printed book—and probably she has acted with policy in so doing. No doubt her volume will have a larger sale than Mr. Harte's more exclusive compilation.

Having quoted about the worst poem in this volume, it is but fair that by way of offset, we should quote the best, correcting certain typographical errors and misreadings in the published version:

OLIVIA.

BY EDWARD POLLOCK.

What are the long waves singing, so mournfully, evermore?
What are they singing so mournfully, as they weep on the sandy shore?
"Oliv.a, oh, Olivin!"—what else can it seem to be!
"Olivin, lost Olivia, will never retu n to thee!"
"Olivia, lost Olivia!"—what else can the sad song be?
—"Weep and mourn, she will not return, she cannot return to thee!"

And strange it is, when the low wind sighs, and strange, when the loud winds blow,
In the rustle of trees, in the roar of the storm, in the sleepiest streamlets flow,
Forever, from ocean or river, ariseth the same sad moan.
—"She sleeps, let her sleep, wake her not—it were best she should rest—and alone."
Forever the same sad requiem comes up from the sorrowful sea.
For the lovely, the lost Olivia, who can not return to me!

Alas! I fear 'tis not in the air, or the sea, or the trees, that strain,
I fear 'tis a wrung heart-aching, and the throb of a tortured brain,
And the shivering whisper of startled leaves, and the sob of the waves as they roll;
I fear they are only the echo of the song of a suffering soul—
Are only the passionless echo of the voice that is ever with me,
—"The lovely, the lost Olivia, will never return to thee!"

I stand in the dim gray morning, where once I stood, to mark
Gliding away along the bay like a bird, her white winged bark;
And when, through the Golden Gate, the sunset radiance rolled,
And the tall masts melted to the thinnest threads in the glowing haze of gold,
I said, "to thine arms I give her, oh kind and shining sea,
And in one long moon from this June eve, you shall let her return to me."

But the wind from the far spice islands came back and it sang with a sigh—
"The ocean is rich with the treasure it has hidden from you and the sky.
And where, amid rocks and green sea-weed the storm and the tide were at war,
The nightly-sought waste was still vacant, when I looked to the cloud and the star;
And soon the sad wind and dark ocean unceasingly sang unto me,
"The lovely, the lost Olivia, will never return to thee!"

Dim and still the landscape lies, but shadowless as heaven;
For the growing morn, and the low-west moon on everything shine even,
The ghosts of the lost have departed, that nothing can ever redeem;
And Nature, in light, sweet slumber, is dreaming her morning dream.
'Tis morn, and our Lord has awakened, and the souls of the blessed are free.
Oh come from the caves of the ocean—Olivia return unto me.

What thrills me?—what comes near me? Do I stand on the sward alone?
Was that a light wind or a whisper?—a touch, or the pulse of a tone?
Olivia! whose spells from thy slumber, my broken heart sway and control,
At length bring'st thou death to me, dearest—or rest to my suffering soul?
No sound but the psalm of the ocean—"Bow down to the solemn decree—
"The lovely, the lost Olivia will never return to thee!"

And still are the long waves singing, so mournfully evermore;
Still are they singing so mournfully, as they weep on the sandy shore—
"Olivia—lost Olivia!"—so ever 'tis doomed to be—
"Olivia—lost Olivia—will never return to thee."
"Olivia, lost Olivia"—what else could the sad song be?—
"Weep and mourn, she will not return—she can not return to thee."

These verses have been compared to Poe's "Annabel Lee," but they are in fact, far finer than that poem. Their full beauty and power are not ordinarily felt at a first perusal, except by persons of an exceptionally poetical temperament. The slight element of the supernatural, that is introduced in the stanza commencing—

"What thrills me?—what comes near me?

evinces the true genius of the writer. Such effects are beyond the reach of mere talent, even when aided by taste, and enriched by culture. We do not know of any American poet, living or dead, who has produced anything of a similar kind, equal to Pollock's "Olivia."

M. PIERRE CAUWET'S "POESIES."

We find upon our book table an elegantly printed volume of poems in French, by Pierre Cauwet, published by Henry Payot of 640 Washington street, San Francisco. The volume comprises some two hundred pages, embracing nearly a hundred pieces on a great variety of subjects, and evincing very considerable poetical talent. In his preface, the author expresses his sense of the rashness of the enterprise upon which he embarked in publishing such a work in the midst of a community like ours, intelligent, yet intensely utilitarian, and so absorbed in the realities of life as to have but little time or interest to devote to the cultivation or enjoyment of literature. Among the compatriots of the author however, and that small portion of our population that can boast an acquaintance with the French language, we think the volume will meet with a cordial reception. Many of the poems are thoroughly Californian in spirit and local coloring. Of these, the following, dated at Scott's Valley, August 1866, is an average specimen:

MATINEE CALIFORNIENNE.

Mille bruits sortaient des buissons sonores;
Les buissons chantaient une ode au ciel bleu;
Le ciel bleu riait à la rose aurore,
Et Phœbus ouvrait son portail de feu.
Oh! le gai printemps, fleur de la jeunesse!
Il volait dans l'air un parfum d'ivresse,
Et du bord des mers aux sommets brûlants
Tout ce que Dieu fit, couleur et sculpture,
La vie entonnait l'hymne à la nature
Dont tous les couplets ont quatre mille ans!

Phœbé, la déesse au regard de marbre,
S'en allait pensive au Nord ténébreux;
An vent matinal, il pleuvait de l'arbe
Des gazouillements d'oiseaux amoureux.
Oh! le gai beau jour! c'était un dimanche;
La Sierra mettait sur sa robe blanche
Une écharpe d'or et de diamants,
Et quelque Tircis, au fond des clairières,
Menait les moutons d'une Deshoulières,
Et sifflait au bois de vieux airs charmants.

La porte s'ouvrit, et puis la fenêtre;
Une belle fille y vint et s'assit.
Un rimeur passait; en voyant paruître
La fille aux yeux bleus, le rimeur sourit.
Oh! le gai visage! où volait son âme?
A qui songeait donc la mignonne femme?
Était-ce au poëte? au fermier voisin?
Les poëtes sont la vanité même.
A qui son regard disait-il: Je t'aime!
Et quel doux penser agitait son sein?

Un instant après, dans l'allée ombreuse,
Le poëte vit l'enfant au front pur;
Penchée ou debout, rimée ou songeuse,
Il suivait ce front étoilé d'azur.
Oh! le gai matin, la saison nouvelle!
Dans les gazons verts quoi donc cherchait-elle?
Un bijou perdu, rubis, perle ou fleur?
C'était une fleur, cette fleur que brille
Dans tous les vingt ans; mais, ô belle fille!
Cette fleur d'amour ne fleurit qu'au cœur!

[CORRESPONDENCE.]

To Mrs. F. MacCrellish, Secretary to the Protestant Orphan Asylum—Madam: The Builders' Insurance Company direct me to place two hundred dollars in your hands, for the use of the Protestant Orphanage, which enjoys the advantage of your protection. At the same sitting the Directors voted two hundred dollars to the Roman Catholic Orphans, on Market street, and other sums also to other deserving charities.

Many persons in the community look upon these donations as advertising tricks, having in view merely notoriety and effect. They come to this conclusion naturally enough, because it is so strange a thing to see a corporation with a soul. The nature of corporations generally, as manifested by their acts and doings, proving that they are destitute of both heart and soul. Now, Madam, the Builders' Insurance Co. will prove, ere twelve months shall pass over, that they have not only a soul in their corporate body, but that they will infuse souls into all the corporations around us, and they apply to Woman, rather than to man, to effect the transmigration.

There is much, very much, to be done in this part of the world, for the interests of humanity, especially the training of the young, which seems to be left mostly to the care of woman; for the men around us appear intent only on the acquisition of wealth, or of political power—things ephemeral. 'Tis woman's mission to cling to the helpless and the unfortunate. Her heart is the last refuge of affrighted truth, and from her lips return to the perturbed world the dove of charity and beneficence.

Respectfully, Madam, your very obedient servant,
THOMAS MOONEY, President.
California street, near Sansome, December 24th, 1866.

SAN FRANCISCO PROTESTANT ORPHAN ASYLUM SOCIETY,
San Francisco, Dec. 31st, 1866.

Thomas Mooney, Esq.—Dear Sir: Permit me, on behalf of the Board of Managers, to tender to you, and through you to the Company you represent, their thanks for your generous donation of $200, which was most gratefully received.

It comes most opportunely at this time of need, and it is a pleasant thought to know there are those who are ever ready to contribute to the support of a cause that appeals so nearly to the sympathy of all. Thanking you for your kind advice and the interest you feel in our well being, with the orphan's thanks, I am, respectfully,

MARY P. MACCRELLISH, Sec'y P. O. Asylum.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 14.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

LAYING ON OF HANDS.—Animal Magnetism, or, to express it in more elegant terms, Physical Magnetism—"Mesmerism"—now styled "Laying on of Hands," dates back to the infancy of history, and presents nothing new to day. It possesses, in addition to its interesting psycological phenomena, some valuable powers in disease: but as a curative agent in any marked form of positive disease it is almost or quite valueless. The judgment of mankind and experience in all ages has so proved it.

DR. BOURNE, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, San Francisco practices an IMPROVED system of Water-Cure which embraces the true natural philosophy, recognizing the fact that sound lungs, sound stomach, an active skin, pure air, pure food, proper habits, proper clothing constitute the sole state and appliances of health. No medicines whatever, mineral or vegetable, as all active medicines are positive poisons.

☞ In almost all cases DR. BOURNE guarantees perfect cures, for a stipulated fee, but especially in Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Fever and Ague, Paralysis, Dropsy, Erysipelas, etc.

READING, AND BATHING BY STEAM "at one and the same time," is one of the original contrivances of Dr. BOURNE, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street which has been observed during some dozen years greatly to the satisfaction of all active minds. The arrangement is as ingenious as it is agreeable to those who employ the Baths. *

MEDICINES.—This branch of my investigation and review of the medical system, is so voluminous, as well as so important, that my time has not permitted me to give it the attention it demands, during the past week. Next week, if possible, it will receive due notice—together with surgical operations.

COBB & SINTON will hold a grand credit sale of 2,000 homestead lots in the O'Neil and Haley tracts, at Platt's Hall on Tuesday, January 15th instant. These lots lay on the water-front to the south of the Potrero, right in the pathway of the city's growth, with United States Patent title, and are probably at the present time the best investment in real estate in the County of San Francisco. For terms of sale, size, and other particulars, see advertisement on 16th page.

The Bay View Park Railway, now in course of construction, will pass through these lots and will probably be finished within a few months from the present time, and must soon advance the value of all the building lots in that vicinity from three to five hundred per cent.

SHARP.—Mr. L. B. Dell, the well known active agent for the Phœnix Insurance Co., signed his commission as agent on the 8th ultimo—which commission was publicly "revoked" on the date of the 9th, by the local manager of the Phœnix. Elsewhere in our paper Mr. Dell, by card, informs those who have been his patrons for years, that "he is ready to effect insurance, and furnish information on insurance matters free of charge.

THE SIGNAL-MAN.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

(From his new Christmas Story, "Mugby Junction.")

"HALLOA! below there!"

When he heard a voice thus calling to him, he was standing at the door of his box, with a flag in his hand, furled round its short pole. One would have thought, considering the nature of the ground, that he could not have doubted from what quarter the voice came; but, instead of looking up to where I stood on the top of the steep cutting nearly over his head, he turned himself about and looked down the Line. There was something remarkable in his manner of doing so, though I could not have said, for my life, what. But, I know it was remarkable enough to attract my notice, even though his figure was foreshortened and shadowed, down in the deep trench, and mine was high above him, and so steeped in the glow of an angry sunset that I had shaded my eyes with my hand before I saw him at all.

"Halloa! below!"

From looking down the Line, he turned himself about again, and, raising his eyes, saw my figure high above him.

"Is there any path by which I can come down and speak to you?"

He looked up at me without replying, and I looked down at him without pressing him too soon with a repetition of my idle question. Just then, there came a vague vibration in the earth and air, quickly changing into a violent pulsation, and an oncoming rush that caused me to start back, as though it had force to draw me down. When such vapor as rose to my height from this rapid train, had passed me and was skimming away over the landscape, I looked down again, and saw him refurling the flag he had shown while the train went by.

I repeated my inquiry. After a pause, during which he seemed to regard me with fixed attention, he motioned with his rolled-up flag towords a point on my level, some two or three hundred yards distant. I called down to him, "All right!" and made for that point. There, by dint of looking closely about me, I found a rough zigzag descending path notched out: which I followed.

The cutting was extremely deep, and unusually precipitate. It was made through a clammy stone that became oozier and wetter as I went down. For these reasons, I found the way long enough to give me time to recall a singular air of reluctance or compulsion with which he had pointed out the path.

When I came down low enough upon the zigzag descent, to see him again, I saw that he was standing between the rails on the way by which the train had lately passed, in an attitude as if he were waiting for me to appear. He had his left hand at his chin, and that left elbow rested on his right hand crossed over his breast. His attitude was one of such expectation and watchfulness, that I stopped a moment, wondering at it.

I resumed my downward way, and, stepping out upon the level of the railroad and drawing nearer to him, saw that he was a dark sallow man, with a dark beard and rather heavy eyebrows. His post was in as solitary and dismal a place as ever I saw. On either side, a dripping-wet wall of jagged stone, excluding all view but a strip of sky: the prospective one way, only a crooked prolongation of this great dungeon; the shorter prospective in the other direction, terminating in a gloomy red light, and the gloomier entrance to a black tunnel, in whose massive architecture there was a barbarous, depressing, and forbidding air. So little sunlight ever found its way to this spot, and it had an earthly deadly smell; and so much cold wind rushed through it, that it struck chill to me, as if I had left the natural world.

Before he stirred, I was near enough to him to have touched him. Not even then removing his eyes from mine, he stepped back one step, and lifted his hand.

This was a lonesome post to occupy (I said), and it had riveted my attention when I looked down from up yonder. A visitor was a rarity, I should suppose; not an unwelcome rarity, I hoped? In me, he merely saw a man who had been shut up within narrow limits all his life, and who, being at last set free, had a newly-awakened interest in these great works. To such purpose I spoke to him; but I am far from sure of the terms I used, for, besides that I am not happy in opening any conversation, there was something in the man that daunted me.

He directed a most curious look towards the red light near the tunnel's mouth, and looked all about it, as if something were missing from it, and then looked at me.

That light was part of his charge? Was it not?

He answered in a low voice: "Don't you know it is?"

The monstrous thought came into my mind as I perused the fixed eyes and the saturnine face, that this was a spirit, not a man. I have speculated since whether there may have been infection in his mind.

In my turn, I stepped back. But in making the action, I detected in his eyes some latent fear of me. This put the monstrous thought to flight.

"You look at me," I said, forcing a smile, "as if you had a dread of me."

"I was doubtful," he returned, "whether I had seen you before."

"Where?"

He pointed to the red light he had looked at.

"There?" I said.

Intently watchful of me, he replied (but without sound), Yes.

"My good fellow, what should I do there? However, be that as it may, I never was there, you may swear."

"I think I may," he rejoined. "Yes, I am sure I may."

His manner cleared, like my own. He replied to my remarks with readiness, and in well chosen words. Had he much to do there? Yes: that was to say, he had enough responsibility to bear; but exactness and watchfulness were what was required of him, and of actual work—manual labor—he had next to none. To change that signal, to trim those lights, and to turn this iron handle now and then, was all he had to do under that head. Regarding those many long and lonely hours of which I seemed to make so much, he could only say that the routine of his life had shaped itself into that form, and he had grown used to it. He had taught himself a language down here—if only to know it by sight, and to have formed his own crude ideas of its pronunciation, could be called learning it. He had also worked at fractions and decimals, and tried a little algebra; but he was, and had been as a boy, a poor hand at figures. Was it necessary for him, when on duty, always to remain in that channel of damp air, and could he never rise into the sunshine from between those high stone walls? Why, that depended upon times and circumstances. Under some conditions there would be less upon the Line than under others, and the same held good as to certain hours of the day and night. In bright weather, he did choose occasions for getting a little above these lower shadows; but, being at all times liable to be called by his electric bell, and at such times listening for it with redoubled anxiety, the relief was less than I would suppose.

He took me into his box, where there was a fire, a desk for an official book in which he had to make certain entries, a telegraphic instrument with its dial face and needles, and the little bell of which he had spoken. On my trusting that he would excuse the remark that he had been well educated, and (I hoped I might say without offence) perhaps educated above that station, he observed that instances of slight incongruity in such-wise would rarely be found wanting among large bodies of men; that he had heard it was so in workhouses, in the police force, even in that last desperate resource, the army; and that he knew it was so, more or less, in any great railway staff. He had been, when young, (if I could believe it, sitting in that hut; he scarcely could,) a student of natural philosophy, and had attended lectures; but he had run wild, misused his opportunities, gone down, and never risen again. He had no complaint to offer about that. He had made his bed, and he lay upon it. It was far too late to make another. All that I have here condensed, he said in a quiet manner, and his grave dark regards divided between me and the fire. He threw in the word "Sir," from time to time, and especially when he referred to his youth, as though to request me to understand that he claimed to be nothing but what I found him. He was several times interrupted by the little bell, and had to read off messages, and replies. Once he had to stand without the door and display a flag as a train passed, and make some verbal communication to the driver. In the discharge of his duties I observed him to be remarkably exact and vigilant, breaking off his discourse at a syllable, and remaining silent until what he had to do was done.

In a word, I should have set this man down as one of the safest of men to be employed in that capacity, but for the circumstance that while he was speaking to me he twice broke off with a fallen color, turned his face toward the little bell when it did not ring, opened the door of the hut (which was kept shut to exclude the unhealthy damp,) and looked out towards the red light near the mouth of the tunnel. On both of those occasions, he came back to the fire with the inexplicable air upon him which I had remarked, without being able to define, when we were so far asunder.

Said I, when I rose to leave him: "You almost make me think that I have met with a contented man."

(I am afraid I must acknowledge that I said it to lead him on.)

"I believe I used to be so," he rejoined, in the low voice in which he had first spoken; "but I am troubled, sir, I am troubled."

He would have recalled the words if he could. He had said them, however, and I took them up quickly.

"With what? What is your trouble?"

"It is very difficult to impart, sir. It is very, very, difficult to speak of. If ever you make me another visit, I will try to tell you."

"But I expressly intend to make you another visit. Say, when shall it be?"

"I go off early in the morning, and I shall be on again at ten to-morrow night, sir."

"I will come at eleven."

He thanked me, and went out at the door with me. "I'll show my white light, sir," he said, in his peculiar low voice, "till you have found the way up. When you have found it, don't call out! And when you are at the top, don't call out!"

His manner seemed to make the place strike colder to me, but I said no more than "Very well."

"And when you come down to-morrow night, don't call out! Let me ask you a parting question. What made you cry 'Halloa! Below there!' to-night?"

"Heaven knows," said I. "I cried something to that effect—"

"Not to the effect, sir. Those were the very words. I know them well."

"Admit those were the very words. I said them, no doubt, because I saw you below."

"For no other reason?"

"What other reason could I possibly have?"

"You had no feeling that they were conveyed to you in any supernatural way?"

"No."

He wished me good night, and held up his light. I walked by the side of the down Line of rails (with a very disagreeable sensation of a train coming behind me,) until I found the path. It was easier to mount than to descend, and I got back to my inn without any adventure.

Punctual to my appointment, I placed my foot on the first notch of the zigzag next night, as the distant clocks were striking eleven. He was waiting for me at the bottom, with his white light on. "I have not called out," I said, when we came close together; "may I speak now?" "By all means, sir." "Good night, then and here's my hand." "Good night, sir, and here's mine." With that, we walked side by side to his box, entered it, closed the door, and sat down by the fire.

"I have made up my mind, sir," he began, bending forward as soon as we were seated, and speaking in a tone but a little above a whisper, "that you shall not have to ask me twice what troubles me. I took you for some one else yesterday evening. That troubles me."

"That mistake?"

"No. That some one else."

"Who is it?"

"I don't know."

"Like me?"

"I don't know. I never saw the face. The left arm is across the face, and the right arm is waved. Violently waved. This way."

I followed his action with my eyes, and it was the action of an arm gesticulating with the utmost passion and vehemence; "For God's sake clear the way!"

"One moonlight night," said the man, "I was sitting here, when I heard a voice cry 'Halloa! Below there!' I started up, looked from that door, and saw this Some one else standing by the red light near the tunnel, waving as I just now showed you. The voice seemed hoarse with shouting, and it cried, 'Look out! Look out!' And then again 'Halloa! Below there! Look out!' I caught up my lamp, turned it on red, and ran towards the figure, calling, 'What's wrong? What has happened? Where?' It stood just outside the tunnel. I advanced so close upon it that I wondered at its keeping the sleeve across its eyes. I ran right up at it, and had my hand stretched out to pull the sleeve away, when it was gone."

"Into the tunnel," said I.

"No. I ran on into the tunnel, five hundred yards. I stopped and held my lamp above my head, and saw the figures of the measured distance, and saw the wet stains stealing down the walls and trickling through the arch. I ran out again, faster than I had run in (for I had a mortal abhorrence of the place upon me,) and I looked all round the red light with my own red light, and I went up the iron ladder to the gallery atop of it, and I came down again, and ran back here. I telegraphed both ways: 'An alarm has been given. Is anything wrong?' The answer came back, both ways: 'All well.'"

Resisting the slow touch of a frozen finger tracing on my spine, I showed him how that this figure must be a deception of his sense of sight, and how that figures, originating in disease of the delicate nerves that minister to the functions of the eye, were known to have often troubled patients, some of whom had become conscious of the nature of their affliction, and had even proved it by experiments upon themselves.

"As to an imaginary cry," said I, "do but listen for a moment to the wind in this unnatural valley while we speak so low, and to the wild harp it makes of the telegraph wires!"

That was all very well, he returned, after we had sat listening for a while, and he ought to know something of the wind and the wires, he who so often passed long winter nights there, alone and watching. But he would beg to remark that he had not finished.

I asked his pardon, and he slowly added these words, touching my arm:—

"Within six hours after the Appearance, the memorable accident on this Line happened, and within ten hours the dead and wounded were brought along through the tunnel over the spot where the figure had stood."

A disagreeable shudder crept over me, but I did my best against it. It was not to be denied, I rejoined, that this was a remarkable coincidence, calculated deeply to impress the mind. But it was unquestionable that remarkable coincidences did continually occur, and they must be taken into account in dealing with such a subject. Though to be sure I must admit, I added (for I thought I saw that he was going to bring the objection to bear upon me,) men of common sense did not allow much for coincidences in making the ordinary calculations of life.

He again begged to remark that he had not finished.

I again begged his pardon for being betrayed into interruptions.

"This," he said, again laying his hand upon my arm, and glancing over his shoulder with hollow eyes, "was just a year ago. Six or seven month passed, and I had recovered from the surprise and shock, when one morning, as the day was breaking. I, standing at the door, looked toward the red-light and saw the spectre again." He stopped, with a fixed look at me.

"Did it cry out?"

"No. It was silent."

"Did it wave its arm?"

"No. It leaned against the shaft of the light, with both hands before the face. Like this,"

Once more I followed his action with my eyes. It was an action of mourning. I have seen such an attitude in stone figures on tombs.

"Did you go up to it?"

"I came in and sat down, partly to collect my thoughts, and partly because it had turned me faint. When I went to the door again, daylight was above me, and the ghost was gone,"

"But nothing followed? Nothing came of this?"

He touched me on the arm with his forefinger twice or thrice, giving a ghastly nod each time:

"That very day, as a train came out of the tunnel, I noticed, at a carriage window on my side, what looked like a confusion of hands and heads, and something waved. I saw it just in time to signal the driver, Stop! He shut off, and put his brake on, but the train drifted past here a hundred and fifty yards or more. I ran after it, and, as I went along, heard terrible screams and cries. A beautiful young lady had died instantaneously in one of the compartments, and was brought in here, and laid down on this floor between us."

Involuntarily I pushed my chair back, as I looked from the boards at which he pointed, to himself.

"True, sir. True. Precisely as it happened, so I tell it you."

I could think of nothing to say, to any purpose, and my mouth was very dry. The wind and the wires took up the story with a long lamenting wail.

He resumed. "Now, sir, mark this, and judge how my mind is troubled. The spectre came back, a week ago. Ever since, it has been there, now and again, by fits and starts."

"At the light?

"At the Danger-light,"

"What does it seem to do?"

He repeated, if possible with increased passion and vehemence, that former gesticulation of "For God's sake clear the way"

Then, he went on, "I have no peace or rest for it. It calls to, me, for many minutes together, in an agonized manner, 'Below there! Look out!' It stands waving to me. It rings my little bell—"

I caught at that. "Did it ring your bell yesterday evening when I was here, and you went to the door?"

"Twice."

"Why, see," said I, "how your imagination misleads you. My eyes were on the bell, and my ears were open to the bell, and, if I am a living man, it did NOT ring at those times. No, nor at any other time, except when it was rung in the natural course of physical things by the station communicating with you."

He shook his head. "I have never made a mistake as to that, yet, sir. I have never confused the spectre's ring with the man's. The ghost's ring is a strange vibration in the bell that it derives from nothing else, and I have not asserted that the bell stirs to the eye. I don't wonder that you failed to hear it. But I heard it."

"And did the spectre seem to be there, when you looked out?"

"It WAS there."

"Both times?

He repeated firmly: "Both times."

"Will you come to the door with me, and look for it now?

He bit his under lip as though he were somewhat unwilling, but arose. I opened the door, and stood on the step, while he stood in the doorway. There, was the Danger light. There, was the dismal mouth of the tunnel. There, were the high wet stone walls of the cutting. There, were the stars above them.

"Do you see it?" I asked him, taking particular note of his face. His eyes were prominent and strained; but not very much so, perhaps, than my own had been when I had directed them earnestly toward the same point.

"No," he answered, "It is not there."

"Agreed," said I.

We went in again, shut the door, and resumed our seats. I was thinking how best to improve this advantage, if it might be called one, when he took up the conversation in such a matter-of-coarse way, so assuming that there could be no serious question of fact between us, that I felt myself placed in the weakest of positions.

"By this time you will fully understand, sir," he said, "that what troubles me so dreadfully, is the question, What does the spectre mean?"

I was not sure, I told him, that I did fully understand.

"What is its warning against?" he said, ruminating, with his eyes on the fire, and only by times turning them on me. "What is the danger? Where is the danger? There is danger overhanging, somewhere on the Line. Some dreadful calamity will happen. It is not to be doubted this thire time, after what has gone before. But surely this is a cruel hunting of me. What can I do?"

He pulled out his handkerchief, and wiped the drops from his heated forehead.

"If I telegraph Danger, on either side of me, or on both, I can give no reason for it," he went on, wiping the palms of his hands. "I should get into trouble, and do no good. They would think I was mad. This is the way it would work:—Message: 'Danger! Take care!' Answer: "What Danger? Where?' Message: 'Don't know. But for God's sake take care!' They would displace me. What else could they do?"

His pain of mind was most pitiable to see. It was the mental torture of a conscientious man, oppressed beyond endurance by an unintelligible responsibility involving life.

"When it first stood under the Danger-light," he went on, putting his dark hair back from his head, and drawing his hands outward across and across his temples in an extremity of feverish distress, "why not tell me where that accident was to happen—if it must happen? Why not tell me how it could be averted—if it could have been averted? When on its second coming it hid its face, why not tell me instead: 'She is going to die. Let them keep her at home?' If it came, on those two occasions, only to show me that its warnings were true, and so to prepare me for the third, why not warn me plainly now? And I, Lord help me! A mere poor signal-man on this solitary station! Why not go to somebody with credit to be believed, and power to act?"

When I saw him in this state, I saw that for the poor man's sake, as well as for the public safety, what I had to do for the time was, to compose his mind. Therefore, setting aside all question of reality or unreality between us, I represented to him that whoever thoroughly discharged his duty, must do well, and that at least it was his comfort that he understood his duty, though he did not understand these confounding Appearances. In this effort I succeeded far better than in the attempt to reason him out of his conviction. He became calm; the occupations incidental to his post as the night advanced, began to make larger demands on his attention: and I left him at two in the morning. I had offered to stay through the night, but he would not hear of it.

That I more than once looked back at the red light as I ascended the pathway, that I did not like the red light, and that I should have slept but poorly if my bed had been under it, I see no reason to conceal. Nor, did I like the two sequences of the accident and the dead girl. I see no reason to conceal that, either.

But, what ran most in my thoughts was the consideration how I ought to act, having become the recipient of this disclosure? I had proved the man to be intelligent, vigilant, painstaking, and exact; but how long might he remain so, in this state of mind? Though in a subordinate position, still he held a most important trust, and would I (for instance) like to stake my own life on the chances of his continuing to execute it with precision?

Unable to overcome a feeling that there would be something treacherous in my communicating what he had told me to his superiors in the Company, without first being plain with himself and proposing a middle course to him, I ultimately resolved to offer to accompany him (otherwise keeping his secret for the present) to the wisest medical practitioner we could hear of in those parts, and to take his opinion. A change in his time of duty would come round next night, he had apprised me, and he would be off an hour or two after sunrise, and on again soon after sunset. I had appointed to return accordingly.

Next evening was a lovely evening, and I walked out early to enjoy it. The sun was not yet quite down when I traversed the field-path near the top to the deep cutting. I would extend my walk for an hour, I said to myself, half an hour on and half an hour back, and it would then be time to go to my signal-man's box.

Before pursuing my stroll, I stepped to the brink, and mechanically looked down, from the point from which I had first seen him. I cannot describe the thrill that seized upon me, when, close at the mouth of the tunnel, I saw the appearance of a man, with his left sleeve across his eyes, passionately waving his right arm.

The nameless horror that oppressed me, passed in a moment, for in a moment I saw that this appearance of a man was a man indeed, and that there was a little group of other men standing at a short distance, to whom he seemed to be rehearsing the gesture he made The Danger-light was not yet lighted. Against its shaft, a little low hut, entirely new to me, had been made of some wooden supports and tarpaulin. It looked no bigger than a bed.

With an irresistible sense that something was wrong—with a flashing self-reproachful fear that fatal mischief had come of my leaving the man there, and causing no one to be sent to overlook or correct what he did—I descended the notched path with all the speed I could make.

"What is the matter?" I asked the men.

"Signal-man killed this morning, sir."

"Not the man belonging to that box?"

"Yes, sir."

"Not the man I know?"

"You will recognize him, sir, if you knew him," said the man who spoke for the others, solemnly uncovering his own head and raising an end of the tarpaulin, "for his face is quite composed."

"O! how did this happen, how did this happen?" I asked, turning from one to another as the hut closed in again.

"He was cut down by the engine, sir. No man in England knew his work better. But somehow he was not clear of the outer rail. It was just at broad bay. He had struck the light, and had the lamp in his hand. As the engine came out of the tunnel, his back was toward her, and she cut him down. That man drove her, and was showing how it happened. Show the gentleman, Tom."

The man, who wore a rough dark dress, stepped back to his former place at the mouth of the tunnel.

"Coming round the curve in the tunnel, sir," he said, "I saw him at the end, like as if I saw him down a perspective-glass. There was no time to check speed, and I knew him to be very careful. As he didn't seem to take heed of the whistle, I shut it off when we were running down upon him, and called to him as loud as I could call."

"What did you say?"

"I said, Below there! Look out! Look out! For God's sake clear the way!"

I started.

"Ah! it was a dreadful time, sir. I never left off calling to him. I put this arm before my eyes, not to see, and I waved this arm to the last; but it was no use."

Without prolonging the narrative to dwell on any one of its curious circumstances more than on any other, I may, in closing it, point out the coincidence that the warning of the engine-driver included, not only the words which the unfortunate signal-man had repeated to me as haunting him, but also the words which I myself—not he—had attached, and that only in my own mind, to the gesticulation he had imitated.

ENIGMA.

I AM composed of sixteen or seventeen letters.

My 16, 14, 3, 4, 6, 9, 15, is something or other, in a general way.

My 2, 11, 7, 14, is something else.

My 9, 6, 4, 10, 15, 11. is the other thing.

My 6, 16, 8, 14, 9, 3, 2, 1, 11, is most anything.

My 5, 3, 9, 14, 7, 3, 1, 11, 5, 6, 16, 2, 13, is most anything else.

My 4, 2, 16, 9, is a good deal like some of the things referred to above, though in what respect it has baffled even me to determine.

My 9, 3, 8, 12, is—is—well, I suppose it is, although I cannot see why.

Now, if anybody can cipher out that enigma, he is an abler man than I am, notwithstanding I got it up myself. It would be a real favor if some one would try, however. I have figured at it, and worked at it, and sweated over it, until I am disgusted, and I can make neither head nor tail of it. I thought it was rather neat at first, but I do not like it so well, now that I can't find out the answer to it. It looks rather easy at a first glance, but you will notice that the further you get into it the more it widens out.

This is my first effort in the enigma line, and, to speak the plain truth, I am considerably stunned at my own success. I do not seem to have just got the hang of this sort of thing, somehow. But I offer the entertaining little trifle to your readers for what it is worth—it may serve to amuse an idle year—and it cannot do much harm—it cannot more than drive a man mad, and make him massacre his relations.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, JANUARY 12, 1867.

RITUALISM AND RELIGIOUS TAILORING.

THE latest development of religious feeling at Oxford, in the shape of an enthusiasm for gorgeous ecclesiastical costume and a splendid ceremonial, while its progress has been quite rapid in England, seems to have met with little in the way of encouragement or imitation in the United States. This was to have been expected, for nothing can be more foreign to the ingrained ideas of Americans than that caricature of ritualism, the chief features of which are posturings, genuflections, church upholstery, and priestly vestments. Yet there is always and everywhere to be found a class of minds in which the religious sentiment will exhibit itself in a leaning toward these things, and in which veneration and devotional feeling are inspired by the agency of stained windows, costly altar cloths, and an elaborate ceremonial. Among women of a devout turn, this class is particularly large. To them a priest is not half a priest unless in priestly garments that seem to mark him visibly as apart from, and superior to other men. The white neck-tie, the grave demeanor, the solemn voice, the sanctified look impress their imaginations; and we do not think that Mr. Reade has at all over estimated the effect of these things even upon so high-spirited and superior a woman as the heroine of Griffith Gaunt. Indeed, the manner in which he describes her instant yielding to priestly authority in one of her most rebellious moods, the moment her confessor assumed his official tone, and "let out the diapason" of his voice, is a genuine stroke of nature, and one of the finest of the minor felicities of the book.

But though Protestant ritualism is making some progress in the United States, it is in a very mild form as compared with the genuine Oxford type, where we are informed that, "strong young men, with whiskers, and big arms and fat calves," who are good cricketers and oarsmen, organize themselves into "holy brotherhoods" and take huge delight in dressing themselves up in the oddest and most expensive ecclesiastical garments as their regular daily costume, walking the public streets "with garments and head dresses on, that give the iniatiated to understand that their wearers are as much priests as it is possible for young laymen to be." It is not probable that we shall even see anything like this in the United States, though undoubtedly these young men are thoroughly sincere in the matter and not without a certain chivalric element in their sincerity; and it must also be admitted that there are much worse and even sillier things that young men are in the habit of doing than forming "holy brotherhoods," and wearing outlandish ecclesiastical vestments.

After all, ritualism, is a matter of religious taste, or of religious termperament. We do not see how it can do harm to anyone. To hard-headed unsentimental persons it seems very absurd, and also to those whose religious fervor is passionate and emotional, as with the Methodists and Baptists, or solemn and profound as in in certain other Protestant sects; but to others, in whom the imaginative element predominates over the intellectual or the passionate, it may be necessary for keeping alive awe and veneration in the soul When we come more fully to realize the fact that there are infinite varieties of mental and moral constitution among human beings, and that the only religious truth which it is possible for us to attain is partial and relative, we shall be prepared to admit that there may be elements of good in all modes of faith, and that the form of worship that we ourselves prefer, may not be the best for our neighbors.

The Tribune has engaged Mr. Dickens to write a novel for its weekly edition—paying for it $25,000. Carlyle has also been engaged to contribute a single article, to cover a page of the daily edition, for which he receives the sum of one hundred and fifty guineas. John Stuart Mill has also been secured as a contributor, for 1867, and the Tribune will, upon the opening of the new year, be printed on heavy paper, similar to that used in working off the daily editions of the London Times.

Sword blades resembling those of Damascus are made at Solingen, Germany. A fagot is first formed of alternate fine bars of iron and steel. It is drawn out, doubled and twisted several times, and then formed into a ribbon. Two such ribbons are welded together, enclosing between them a thin blade of the best cutting English steel. After polishing, it is dipped in diluted sulphuric acid to give it a pattern.

THE NEW ROUTE TO CHINA AND JAPAN.

WE find on our table a neat phamphlet entitled A sketch of the New Route to China and Japan by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.'s Line. This book comes "with the compliments of Turnbull & Smith, Printers, 522 Clay street," whose imprint it bears, but is, we presume, published by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. for the purpose of setting forth the advantages of the new route. The book is modestly written and is quite up to the average standard of works of its class. The writer addresses himself to Europeans especially, and gives a brief account of the most remarkable features of the trip. He gives the following advice to the European on his arrival in New York:

"To suggest what to visit about the city of New York, where one's time is limited, would be the height of absurdity. The city presents so much of variety, that to attempt a selection would be a thankless piece of work. The best plan is to jump into a hackney coach and give the driver a carte blanche to take you where he pleases. You must tell him, of course, that you are a stranger and wish to see as much as possible in a given amount of time, and the probabilities are that he will then show you a very fair proportion of all that can be seen on a drive."

We do not think the above advice judicious. As a rule, it is unsafe in any country to give a hackney coach-driver carte blanche to take you where he pleases, and especially injudicious to inform him that you are a stranger. The author of this work is, however, very honest, he fairly sets forth the discomforts of the voyage by the new route and does not exaggerate the beauties of the places which the passengers will have a chance of visiting. However, he strongly insists that the new route is the best, and is sure that though Englishmen are, "prejudiced against Yankee steamers, particularly on account of not admiring, or feeling confidence in the Yankee engines, they delight in seeing something new, and if they can avoid Chinese, Hindoos, Turks, Arabs, Parsees, Maltese and Frenchmen, and their respective countries, they will do so in order to have an inspection of Yankees and Yankee land, and Spanish America and its people, especially when they can have so much comfort besides."

The author begs the indulgence of the reader for his book, because it only took him a week to get it up, and concludes with the following request:

"Give the work all the credit you can, and find as little fault as possible."

This request we have complied with because the author writes good English and shows no disposition to exaggerate.

Not Ornamental.—The new Presbyterian Church on Mission street, which has just been completed, for the use of Dr. Scuddder's congregation, can scarcely be numbered among the architectural ornaments of the city. In fact it seems to possess no architecturul character whatever. If criticised from an artistic stand point, it is quite impossible to say anything in its favor; indeed, we are given to understand that some merit is claimed for it, on the ground of the absence of all "architectural gewgaws." Nevertheless the structure can make no pretensions even to the merit of plainness. The four ponderous "columbiads" on its front do not avail to hide either its ungainly proportions or the awkward arrangement of the roof; and the rear of the building as it towers above the surrounding edifices is stronlgy suggestive of the "sawdust." The entrances also, seem singularly narrow and cramped. Had they been of ampler proportions—and we can see no valid reason why they should not have been—the front would certainly have looked the better for it. We are informed that the plans for the ill-proportioned and clumsy structure were obtained from New York. It is some satisfaction to know that none of our resident architects are responsible for such a monstrosity.

The Banner of Progress.—We have received the first copy of the Banner of Progress published by Benjamin Todd and W. H. Manning, at 522 Clay street. This paper will be published every Saturday and devoted to Spiritualism and "liberal religious ideas." It is by far the best looking Spiritualist newspaper published in the United States. A beatifully engraved head drawn by Nahl Bros., adorns the first page, and the paper typographically presents a lively and cheerful appearance. The articles are nearly all original and comprise contributions from Fanny Green McDougal and Mrs. G. R. Williams. There is nothing strikingly original in the editorials, but a good deal in them which goes to prove that if the orthodox churches are uncharitable towards Spiritualists, the latter are equally dogmatic in their utterances, and equally prejudiced with the professors of the old established creeds. We miss in this paper the only thing which can render it saleable, viz: reports of the proceedings of Spiritualistic circles, telegrams from the spirit world, shocking doggrel purporting to have been composed by Byron in the Spirit-land, and other supernatural compositions. If this Spiritual paper is to succeed, Spirit editors must be engaged at once.

Nast's Picture.—In consequence of the weather having prevented many persons paying a visit to Snow & Routh's art gallery, 219 Montgomery street, Nast's picture of "Marching Through Georgia" will remain on exhibition during the present month.

A NEW CALIFORNIA MAGAZINE.

"Every Day Life" is the title of a new California Magazine, the first number of which lies before us, attractive in its typographical appearance, and filled with a variety of pleasant and edifying reading matter, as we infer from the table of contents and a hasty glance at the articles themselves. Mrs. Washington Wright, better known as "Carrie Carlton," under which nom de plume her best pieces have been published, is the editress and part proprietor of the Magazine. Among the contents are two contributions which we have found time to read, and of which we can speak in terms of unqualified praise. The first is an exquisite little poem by Charles Warren Stoddard, conceived in his finest vein and executed in his most faultless manner; the second is a characteristic piece by Ina D. Coolbrith. We give them both, according the precedence, of course the lady:

SPIDERS.

I walked through the garden of lilies,
And found in the fairest one
A great, black spider, weaving
His shining web in the sun.
Airily, swiftly darting
To and fro as he spun,
Till the glittering mesh was woven,
The silvery snare was done.

I saw in the moon-lit garden,
A lover and maiden meet;
His eyes were true and tender,
And his words, how pure and sweet!
Why did I think of my lily—
The very fairest one—
And the great black spider, weaving
His cruel web in the sun?

A RAIN SONG.

Though I would shield you from the snow,
And from the fierce four winds that blow,
I could not once forbid the rain
To tarry, or to come again;
If I did know
Delightful sorcery, and art,
Sweet heart! Sweet-heart!

I'd kneel to save your tender feet
From hurting in the ice, and sleet,
But love you, darling, in the rain
Adown the lane, adown the lane
With motion fleet:
Where buds and early-grasses start;
Sweet-heart! Sweet-heart!

I'd beg the bonds of summer break,
And fade away, for your dear sake.
Still, thirsting for the falling rain,
My spirit, wearying, would fain
Some comfort take
With singing, till the clouds depart,
Sweet-heart! Sweet-heart.!

The courageous and enterprising spirit which has prompted the founders of Every Day Life to embark in so hazardous an undertaking as that of starting a California monthly after the disastrous issue of all previous attempts of the kind, is worthy of admiration; and we heartily wish them that large measure of success which they will undoubtedly merit if they shall be able to furnish us a Magazine fairly representing the spirit and talent of the State. Finally, we would in all kindness advise the managers of the periodical, either to abstain entirely from dealing with political issues, or else to handle them in a manly, outspoken style. The only article in the present number that bears upon national questions is written in the most jesuitical spirit, hinting at what it seems as though the writer would, yet dare not plainly say, and striving by all manner of crab like indirections to advocate something which he does not wish to seem to advocate.

Stoddard's Poems.—We are glad to learn that Mr. Charles Warren Stoddard, the most richly gifted of our rising California poets, is about to publish in a handsome volume, a selection from the pieces which, during several years past he has contributed to literary papers of the State, together with others that have never been published. Mr. Stoddard's genious has already, young as he is, acquired a wide recognition. His reputation is not merely a local one. The leading literary papers at the East have long been in the habit of republishing every scrap of verse from his pen that appears in the columns of the Californian, and the promised volume will be welcomed by a large circle of appreciative admirers.

Woodward's Garden.—The museum filled with its thousands of curiosities, the conservatory with every variety of grape in growth, and the magnificent picture gallery—all under cover—have attractions that drew many a visitor from the city, even during the late stormy weather. No stranger should visit San Francisco without seeing Woodward's Garden and its contents.

The Pioneers.—This association have recently issued a very handsome pamphlet containing their constitution and by-laws as revised and adopted in October, 1866; a list of officers and an alphabetical list of members—952 in all—with a record of the date of arrival of each in California.

Laura Cuppy will lecture at Maguire's Opera House on Sunday evening as usual. The audience will have the selection of the subject. Mrs. Cuppy is prepared to lecture at any of the surrounding towns and villages during the week.

The Olympic Club's Monthly Reception.—The next social reception of the Olympians will take place at their rooms, on Friday evening, January 18th instant. We acknowledge the compliment of an invitation.

MOODS.

I.

O MY beloved, e'er the sun is down,
Where is my young renown?

O, dear beloved, e'er the day is past,
Where is my portion cast?

If I have falsely sung I sought amends—
Yet still the sun descends.

And I have striven hard and constantly,
Yet still the day goes by.

What is a lump unto my stumbling feet,
With life no longer sweet?

The stars, in differing glories, what are they
To the good warmth of day?

Where is my lacking, that the world denies
Unto my art the prize?

Gird me about with wings that I may speed,
Touching the stars, indeed.

Strong is the spirit, is the flesh so weak?
O, best beloved, speak!

Is there no gift in store for such as I?
Beloved love, reply.

II.

O, my beloved, though the night were here,
Still could thy presence cheer.

False is the smile of Fame, and soon obscure,
How doth thy light endure!

Fame beckons all and courts the multitude;
How doth thy love exclude!

How doth thy love exclude all, saving me,
I kept unworthily—

Retained, made richer by endowment, filled
Full of thy grace, yet skilled

To walk in modesty. O, perfect heart
Night is not where thou art!"

How can I comprehend and value thee
Out of my poverty?

Amid thy lavish elements dishursed,
I faint and am a-thirst?

Too prodigal of sweets to satisfy—
Drinking, I still am dry!

And hunger ever though forever fed,
Beloved! Beloved!

San Francisco, 1867. CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

A CHILD LOOKING UP WISHFULLY AT A RIPE CHERRY.

Cherry! sweet cherry! my lips they are drouth,
While I lie watching—please fall in my mouth;
While I lie watching the bird and the bee,
Waiting and watching sweet cherry for thee.

Here will I rest in the shade all the day,
Rest while the bird and the bee are at play,
Watching the wind and the bird and the bee,
Waiting and watching sweet cherry for thee.

Here will I lie till the wind of the south
Shake thee and make thee fall in my mouth;
Watching the wind and the bird and the bee,
Waiting and watching sweet cherry for thee.

Were I a bee or a bird I would fly
Up and away with thee cherry so high;
Up and away with the bird and bee,
Not waiting and watching old cherry for thee.

A DEDICATION.

The sea gives her shells to the shingle,
The earth gives her streams to the sea;
There are many, but my gift is single,
My verses, the first fruits of me.
Let the wind take the green and the gray leaf,
Cast forth without fruit upon air;
Take rose-leaf and vine-leaf and hay-leaf
Blown loose from the hair.

The night shakes them round me in legions,
Dawn drives them before her like dreams;
Time sheds them like snows on strange regions,
Swept shoreward on infinite streams;
Leaves pallid and sombre and ruddy,
Dead fruits of the fugitive years;
Some stained as with wine and made bloody,
And some as with tears.

ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

THE B'nai Berith Literary and Social Circle will give their inaugural entertainment, at Platt's Hall, on next Tuesday evening. The programme consists of the nautical drama of Black Eyed Susan, which was so effectively presented by the same society, several weeks since, and a recitation, "Damon and Pythias" (in German), to be followed by the lively farce of Box and Cox. Married and Settled. The cast in full—all amateurs—can be found in our advertising columns. A ball will conclude this very full programme. The proceeds will be presented to the Ladies' United Hebrew Benevolent Society.

M. ALEXANDRE DUMAS fils, in spite of his determination to write no more for the stage, has just read a new comedy, entitled "Les Idées de Madame Aubray, to a select circle of friends.

A PLEA FOR LAZINESS.

BY PRENTICE.

A LARGE portion of mankind would lie abed in the morning were they able. It is the necessity of gaining bread which drags from their warm, comfortable couches thousands of miserable unfortunates these cold, dark, dreary mornings. A cup of coffee, or a slight repast, before arising is not at all objectionable, although our grandparents regarded such luxuries as abominable, and even unholy.

The physical degeneracy of a portion of the American people, is owing to an excess of industry. They have been over-dosed by such maxims as—

"Early to bed and early to rise,
Makes a man healthy, wealthy and wise."

We have been too often told to "go to the ant, consider her ways and be wise." We have formed an exaggerated idea of the industrious habits of the ant, or else we have not been to her at all, for that insect only labors by daylight, and, moreover, sleeps all the winter. Ants never run the risk of freezing their feet or the tips of their noses, at five o'clock on a winter's morning.

I was brought up on a New England farm, until the age of eighteen. Up to that period my life was one dreary round of work, work, work. I was told to be virtuous, to be honest, and above all to be industrious. My parents, my aunts, my uncles, the schoolmaster, the deacons, the minister of the parish and many ancient maidens pelted me with the maxims of Poor Richard. I did work, and worked hard, from sunrise to sunset in the summer, and from the late darkness of the winter's morn to the early candlelight of its evening. I milked the cows at five o'clock, and chored till breakfast. I ploughed and sowed in the Spring; mowed and raked in the Summer; cut wood and split rails in Winter, in addition to the endurance of that three month's schooling, during the same season, in a shabby, little red schoolhouse at the cross-roads, with its rows of dirty, unpainted, ink-spattered, pine desks; its uncomfortable benches; its box stove with its extremes of heat and cold; its confined and dreadful atmosphere arising from a lack of proper ventilation, and its crabbed schoolmaster.

Then there were the four holidays pertaining to the New England year, New Year's, Christmas, Fourth of July and Thanksgiving. Even these were not perfect holidays. My people could not endure the extravagance of a perfect holiday.

At twenty I commenced thinking—most lazy men do waste a vast amount of time in idle thought. I wondered if it was an inevitable necessity that I should endure existence upon the treadmill of twelve or fourteen hours of work per day.

Well, I discovered that some people got along very well with less; and, as one naturally turns from a rugged into a well-beaten track when both lead to the same destination, I resolved to emulate their example. I have made it a study to live, and live decently, with comparatively little labor. I entertain no thought of gaining a fortune; not even a competency. My health is excellent. I am, however, willing to admit there are some luxuries I would be glad to get; a wife, for instance, but I cannot afford to slave even for that luxury My friends term me lazy. That does not trouble me. I laugh as I behold them rushing by, wearing out body and soul in the chase after dollars, and I almost weep when I see so many other poor souls, or rather bodies, toiling so hard for a mere pittance, while the surplus derived from their labor goes for the purchase of luxuries for those who do not need them.

Industry is a great thing—in its place. But I object to the excess of that useful article. Solomon's proverbs and Ben Franklin's maxims added to our natural acquisitiveness are helping to ruin the American people.

I know you will laugh at this; but there are generations yet to come who will devote two hours to recreation where you now devote one, and these people will laugh and wonder much at you. They will hold me as a martyr, who endured ridicule and censure for the sake of my convictions concerning the propriety of moderate laziness. I know that excess of work, mental as well as physical, is at the bottom of our physical degeneracy. There is your industrious farmer who believes in "the early bird catching the worm." Has this life long exercise in catching matutinal worms made him a model of physical perfection? Is he not oftener long, lean, angular and flat-chested, with a sharp, care-worn face, besides evincing extensive traces of hirsute denudation before forty? True, there is an ideal, healthy, ruddy-faced farmer, known as the embodiment of heartiness and good cheer, but he is found mostly in the books. And their wives too. I have seen them in the East, and the West, and know well how they look. To one healthy woman, there are ten lean, bony, spooky looking sisters, whose entire existence is a fret between the oven, the churn, the baby and the wash tub. They endure existence because they are obliged to.

Yes "early to bed and early to rise," and, poor creatures, they deem it impious to sit up after nine o'clock, though their souls, by some rare chance, might be as joyful as King David's when he danced before the Ark, for the household must be up and doing at four to-morrow morning, in the exercise of the perpetual drudgery necessary to perpetuate a miserable existence. I should think they would finally turn into their coffins with a sigh of relief that their washing, baking, ironing, churning and drudgery was all over. No wonder the papers teem with advertisements of female medicaments.

Do you think this style of living improves the stock? No. This excess of labor, not only breaks us down physically and mentally at an early age, but its evils are also entailed on our children. Our daughters are fair and delicate at twenty, but the blight which falls upon them ere thirty, is proverbial. They have run almost entirely to seed when the Englishwoman is in her prime. There is scarcely such a thing as matronly beauty among us. You may laugh at me as much as you please but I shall persist in the practice and advocacy of my theory. I contend that had our fathers and mothers and grandfathers and grandmothers laid in bed a little longer those cold mornings, and practiced a little more wholesome laziness, we should not now hear so much of the foreign supplanting the native population in the New England States.

Talk of dissipation making wrecks of men! Why, there are ten heads made bald, ten faces wrinkled, ten cases of prostration and paralysis, and ten constitutions broken down entirely at thirty-five by over-work, where there is one by dissipation. Therefore, as long as I can afford it, I shall choose the better part and be lazy.

JOURNALISM.—A late number of the Round Table contains an article on Journalism in which occurs the following advice to young men entering the profession:

"Young men who have made the attempt, or contemplate becoming journalists should purge themselves of all desire to write editorials, and go to work to learn the routine of the profession. Let them begin as reporters and work their way up, for in this way alone can they acquire the knowledge that is requisite for success in after life. The tact to discern what is news, to determine how to place it before the public, comes by experience, not by intuition; and when this is acquired it will be a simple matter to write editorials. The man who overflows with thoughts is never at a loss for a way of expressing them to others, and, ten chances to one, he will prefer to employ himself with inspiring those about him rather than attempting to put all his conceptions in writing. Another important consideration is that the province of a daily newspaper is to collect news. To this end everything else should bend. The paper which is most enterprising in the publication of news is sure to distance its competitors in the long run; and the paper which realizes to the fullest extent Burke's idea of a newspaper, that it is 'the history of the world for one day,' is certain of achieving a greater degree of success that any of its contemporaries that regard a journal simply as a medium for the expression of opinion."

A FRENCH ELEPHANT.—The following anecdote amusingly illustrates the exquisite pleasure which the French papers take in telling stories that nobody believes: "The interior of an elephant's trunk is lined with an immense olfactory nerve, by which the animal is able to detect, the faintest odors at a distance. He finds that the orange flower yields the most delicious of all perfumes, and travelers state that in Japan elephants may frequently be seen burying their trunks in the foliage of the orange trees to enjoy the fragrance. The other day the large elephants in the Jardin de Plantes suddenly ceased picking up the bread and cake offered to him by the visitors of the garden, drew in his trunk and continued to follow along the railings of his enclosure a lady who was carrying in her hand a bouquet of orange flowers. The lady's attention was called to his movement, and she at once held the bouquet within his reach. The animal seized the flowers, inhaled the perfume with great delight for several moments, and —here comes the least credible portion of the story—again put forth his trunk and restored the bouquet to the lady

One understands an elephant's passion for sweet smells but hardly comprehends his manifestation of gallantry and good breeding.

Annihilating Ferocity.

The diminutive Dramatic Chronicle has commenced a wholesale attack upon the big dailies, which seems to indicate the design of exterminating them all in order that it may itself monopolize the field of journalism. For some weeks past it has persistently assailed the Times (which it evidently considers in the light of a rival commenced as an "opposition" to the Chronicle) with the wanton ardor of a cock-sparrow in pairing time. On one day it exultingly drags to light some blunder in the commercial column, some misquotation of the price of barley—or of putty. The next, it indulges in savage triumph over some grammatical or rhetorical slip in the "hen editorial" department. Not content with maintaining this constant supervision of the Times, it lectures the Alta about the "sloppy style of its leaders, rebukes the Sacramento Union for the "crudeness" of its political utterances. Sneers at the Call for its "potoe-growing utilitarianism;" exhorts the Spectator to avoid preaching secesh doctrine; snubs the Era and Mercury as "flash Sunday papers," besides keeping an eye on the Examiner, and regulating the interior Press generally. The discharge of duties so numerous, so varied, and so responsible, must involve an extraordinary degree of mental wear and tear on the part of the editor of the gratuitous sheet."

THE FIRST SNOW FALL.

THE snow had begun in the gloaming
And busily all the night
Had been heaping field and highway
With a silence deep and white.

Every pine, and fir, and hemlock,
Wore ermine too dear for an earl,
And the poorest twig on the elm tree
Was fringed inch deep with pearl.

From sheds now roofed with Carrara,
Came Chanticleer's muffled crow,
The stiff rails were softened to swan's down—
And still fluttered down the snow.

I stood and watched by the window
The noiseless work of the sky,
And the sudden flurries of snow-birds,
Like brown leaves whirring by.

I thought of a mount in sweet Auburn,
Where a little head-stone stood—
How the flakes were folding it gently,
As did robins the babes in the wood.

Up spoke our own little Mabel,
Saying, "Father, who makes it snow?"
And I told her of the good All-father
Who cares for us all below.

Again I looked at the snow fall,
And thought of the leaden sky
That arched o'er our first great sorrow
When the mount was heaped so high.

I remembered the gradual patience
That fell from that cloud-like snow,
Flake by flake, healing and hiding
The scar of that deep-stabbed woe.

And again to the child I whispered,
"The snow that husheth all,
Darling, the Merciful Father
Alone can make it fall."

Then with eyes that saw not, I kissed her,
And she, kissing back, could not know
That my kiss was given to her sister
Folded close under deepening snow.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

LITERARY TUMBLERS.

ANYBODY who considers the vast amount of ephemeral literature produced in this favored country cannot fail to be struck with the universal desire of writers who cater for the appetites of partially educated men and women to provide something funny and witty for their entertainment. One good poet represents, as we know, a floating mass of some thousand unrecognised poetasters, whose poetry is only appreciated by their sisters, and still more by their sisters' governesses. But for every single work of real humor there are, it would seem, millions of little jeux d'esprit the authors of which are always anxiously attempting to amuse their fellow-creatures, and to rise to the level of waggery at least. And it is a pleasure for all thoughtful minds to be able to reflect that the ambition to to be thought funny is much more easily gratified than the wish be thought a fine and grand poet. Nobody who begins the race with health and spirits, and a patient resolution to learn, need leave hope behind. Every literary tumbler, no matter what his merits, represents, we may be sure, an audience who stop still to look at him, or else his tumbling would come to a speedy end, and the magazine or newspaper which now knows him would know him no more; and one need scarcely say that there is every possible sort of audience to be discovered if tumblers only choose the right streets and thoroughfares in the Vanity Fair of literature.

Between buffoonery and humor there are plenty of gradations, in the world of letters as well as upon the stage. But there is one characteristic so common to all that it may almost be taken as a type of the innumerable varieties of artificial fun upon which the public are regaled. This is cheeriness—a sort of literary sugar-candy invented originally by Mr. Dickens, and sprea thick over all his really humorous compositions. And when I see the success of the many correspondences of the daily pa ers all over the habitable globe, and admire the sort of univ al brotherhood that subsists between the traveling gentleme who are cheery in America and their colleagues who are equall cheery at Paris, or Constantinople, or Venice, one cannot he wondering whether, after all, it was Mr. Dickens' genius and umor, or his cheeriness and resolution to seem amiable, tha made the middle and lower classes like him. It is evident th if cheeriness, unaccompanied by the more substantial stuff ich the mere mannerism of Mr. Dickens covers, is only a poor rt of varnish, at all events it is a very saleable article; and th gh, unlike the quality of mercy, it cannot be said never to b strained, in another way it resembles the quality of mercy ery well, inasmuch as it affords apparently equal satisfaction t the giver and the receiver.

It is easy to conceive the instructions with which these gentlemen set out on their genial way; how their employer, on dismissing them to Timbuctoo or to St. Petersburg, when he squeezes their hand for the last time, reminds them above all things of the imperative necessity of being cheery; how they go forth determined—whether the object of their journey be the Andes or the Himalayas, Christians or cannibals, war, commerce or a World's Fair—to survey it from a strictly cheery point of view. And imagination can suggest the sort of literary person who is always cheery. What he has to do is no easy matter at the outset. He has to transplant to foreign climates and unknown countries the qualities which make the British bagman so deservedly popular upon the road, and at railway inns, in his own happy land. To do this, and to do this well, is not perhaps a mark of the greatest literary talent, but it requires considerable energy and rough power. To know exactly how to call your gondolier Antonio, and the waiter at your café Philippe, and to know how to write pleasantly in your letters home about their manners and the half-hours spent in their society, and to be able above all things to extract from their conversation information enough about the life and haute politique of the country to give those home letters a considerable flavor of fashion and diplomacy, is no mean art. This kind of cheeriness is not a universal accomplishment. To describe in a boistrous and picturesque way the fish they had for dinner, and the insects they had afterward, or to hint, for the benefit of the thousands at home, that they are sufficiently acquainted with the coulisses of the opera to call Clotilde by her Christian name. It is not everybody who could do this sort of thing, but cheeriness does it, and does it on the whole well, and in a way worthy of its hire.

Like other styles, the cheery style has its disadvantages, while it has its obvious excellencies; and one disadvantage is that it is not easy to go on being cheery upon paper, day after day without becoming a little affected, and a little intrusive of one's own personal individuality. When the cheery correspondent has once established a reputation, and is known as the funny fellow at Paris or Timbuctoo, he has to keep up the pace, and never can afford not to be comical. The first thing that happens to him is that he begins to talk a good deal about himself. He has become a person instead of a pen, and finds it necessary to tell us where he walked in the afternoon, and whom he saw; and it would be very difficult for him, after a few weeks, not to draw a little upon his fancy for descriptions of the social sphere in which he is moving. The downward progress of the cheery correspondent, as far as these little white lies are concerned, may be without difficulty conceived. One week, in a moment of thoughtlessness and without reflecting upon all the consequences, he allows himself to dine with a fictitious duke. He finds the effect good, very good, and very cheaply attained. The next week he does it again; and the third week he goes with him (on paper) to the Cercle or to the races. Writing home about imaginary dukes is such an inexpensive way of mixing in all the best society of the Continent, that the cheery correspondent at last finds himself rapidly becoming an unknown star of fashion in his own printing-office, before he has had time to learn the names of the streets where he is staying. The devil of it is (if we may be pardoned the expression) that the poor fellow, having once launched into this sort of social distinction, is obliged to keep it up. He must go to all the balls of all the duchesses, in imagination if not in reality, frequent the little parties at Court, and know all that is doing at the Embassy, or there is an end of him; and the drain upon his mental powers is very serious. Cheeriness brought him to this, and cheeriness alone can get him out of it. Accordingly, he flourishes away as best he can, and dashes off diplomatic and fashionable intelligence in positive despair. The knowing way in which he works off an Empire or two in a sentence is, and ought to be, a study to all slower artists.

This characteristic is indeed common to all cheery correspondents, whether they indulge in the little venial fictions we have described or not. There is a talk about complications at Vienna, but the cheery correspondent has been warned on the best authority that there is nothing in it. He has reason, from what he has learnt at the Embassy, to assure his readers that there is absolutely no foundation for the rumor that the Queen of Spain has eloped with the leading tenor of the Opera Lyrique, or that another pronunciamento is preparing by General Prim. The French Emperor is looking better than ever, and it was only the other day that Marshal X. remarked to a "friend of mine" that he should not be surprised if there was a decided movement against the Jesuits in Upper Austria before the winter was out. These little political gems are, however, only pauses in the waltz—the endless bewildering waltz of cheeriness, geniality, and fun. It is a happiness, for all those who do not and could not possess such spirits, to think that there are those who do; and that some of those who do may not be, after all, bad fellows, or necessarily resemble bagmen, except perhaps in their literary style.

The literary tumblers, however, who accompany royal personages on their tours, or who settle down to see and record life as it is at some Continental metropolis, are only one out of many species of tumblers. Their name is, indeed, legion. There is the tumbler who publishes his volume of comic sketches, as there is the tumbler who communicates to country papers the latest gossip from the city. One very high effort which tumblers are occasionally obliged to attempt is the task of making padding cheery. To cast a general atmosphere of high spirits over some of the more popular pieces of information which the Encyclopædia contains, and to transfer the whole with an air of graceful banter to a magazine, is a considerable feat, and one which tries the aspirant's powers in no slight degree. If any young beginner wishes to see what a veteran can do in such a line, he has only to turn to the pages of a magazine published this month, and admire the performances of one who is said, by those who are initiated into such matters, to be a first-rate tumbler indeed.

The tumbler in question appears to be writing an article on one of the principal streets in one of the chief provincial towns in England, and an instructive article too. Suddenly the thought seems to flash across him that he has not made a joke for a whole page or so, and that the time has come for him to tumble again. Accordingly, apropos of the want of novelty in the streets of Manchester, he performs the following literary exploit; which we only mention because it is the kind of thing tumblers have to do, and may be chosen as an instance of what the young ones may hope to come to, when they are well fledged and strong upon their legs:—

"I mean to write an essay, some of these days, upon the "Monotony of Modern Civilization." Some notion of the monotony I mean may, perhaps come over you in perusing these papers. One street is closely similar to another. Cæsarea and Pompeii are very much alike, especially Pompeii."

This is an instructive extract, because it illustrates at one and the same moment several features that distinguish the tumbler. In the first place, we may see that cheeriness puts a man immediately on familiar terms with a large portion of his audience; and we must not look at this from a too fastidious or educated point of view. A great many honest, though perhaps uncultivated, English people like a little familiarity in their newspaper or their review, just as they like a dash of audacious brusqueness in their popular preacher. When they buy their paper at the corner of the street, they expect to be chucked under the chin by some pleasant-hearted penman in its columns, and would rather miss the absence of such an attention than otherwise. Nobody who did not know this trait in the character of the semi-literary masses would venture to think he was interesting them by promising them an essay some day or other on something different from his present essay. A tumbler, however, who has the ear of his audience may do it, and do it well. And, in the second place, no tumbler who was not thoroughly at his ease would ever be cool enough to hazard the fun about Cæsarea and Pompeii, which, as far as the argument of the essay is concerned, is of course absolutely pointless. The author does not mean it to be otherwise than pointless. All that he intends to use it for is to remind his audience, "Though I am firing away padding for the nonce, I am your old tumbler after all, and as cheery as ever in spite of the dreariness of the task." And such little gambols in the middle do perhaps make padding more tolerable to the tumbler's admirers. If anybody can make padding light and puffy for the million, it is a literary genius who can stop to smile and pat them on the back while he is composing it. And as reading padding is a meritorious exercise, there can be no doubt that the tumbler who encourages young men and women of any class to read it is, upon the whole, a benefactor to his species.

One great way of knowing a tumbler, when we see him, is to watch whether or not his object is to describe what he sees, or to describe himself. Literary tumbling, consisting as it does of jovial personal antics on the part of the performers, necessarily draws the attention of the reader from the subject to the man. And thus writing about the subject becomes twenty times as easy as before; just as it is easier for the Wizard of the North to get through a card-trick when the company are watching his grimaces. The other day a tumbler at Venice had to write several columns about a Royal procession down the Grand Canal. As Venice has been frequently, and one would think sufficiently, described already, and as the adventures of a gondola can be exhausted, the task was no easy one. What did the tumbler do? He described the "Derby-dog" The Derby-dog led, by an evident association of ideas, to the Venetian dog, and as Venetian dogs may be seen on the Grand Canal, the transition to gondolas became simple. Nobody of course objected to this, because it was a tumbler who did it, and in literature the tumbler is a privileged person. He fills a very distinct gap, and fills it with ability, and appears to enjoy his own occupation as much as most men enjoy their particular calling.—London Saturday Review.

POPULAR PHRASES.—The term "masterly inactivity" originated with Sir James Mackintosh. "God tempers the wind to the shorn-lamb," which everybody who did not suppose it was in the Bible, credited to Sterne, was stolen by him from George Herbert, who translated it from the French of Ernestine. "The cup which cheers but not inebriates," was conveyed by Cowper from Bishop Berkley in his "Siris." Wordsworth's "the child is father to the man," is traced from him to Milton, and from him to Sir Thomas Moore. "Like angel's visits, few and far between," is the offspring of Hook—it is not Thomas Campbell's original thought: Old John Norris (1658) originated it, and after him Robert Blair, as late as 1745. "There's a good time coming," is Scott's phrase in "Rob Roy;" and the "almighty dollar" is Washington Irving's happy thought.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, bears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after bearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

Sole agents for BARSTOW'S PATENT METALLIC BURIAL CASES and CASKETS.

A novel scene took place a few nights since at a sporting house in the disreputable locality of Water street, New York. There had been a rat match and a dog fight, at which a sailor was present, who in leaviug the place was saluted with a growl from a huge bear chained up. Jack became indignant and offered to fight the bear for drinks for the crowd. The bet was made and the money posted, when the bear was cut loose, and a regnlar rongh and tnmble fight occurred. The sailor was a remarkably muscular fellow, and snfficiently active to avoid the embrance of Bruin. For a short time the result was rather doubtful, but the sailor at length got the bear down, knelt upon him and seizing him by the throat nearly strangled the beast, and squeezed all the fight out of him, so Jack received his money back, and the owner of the bear paid for the drinks.

INTELLECTUAL SUPERIORITY OF FISH.—The intellectual and scientific superiority of fish is vouched for in the fact that no single instance of a submarine telegraphic cable being injured by a fish of any kind or size has yet occurred. Every creature with fins flees from it, so that it fares much better than the wire on land in India, where the monkeys are persuaded that the poles and lines are erected for them to use in gymnastic exercises.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.—One of our exchanges announces that the distinguished personage known among the ancients by the name of Cupid, has recently changed his name to Cupidity, and will hereafter devote his attention to matters of money, as well as love affairs.

EARLY in the war, men buried their gold and silver all about in the South, and now it is being dug up in odd and far-apart places. Placers, rather.

This latter firm stands A No. 1 in the east, and their wagons have stood the te-t of our California clim te, and are sold by Mills & Evans fifty per cent. lower than any other establishment on the Pacific coast. Call and examine their Wagons, at No. 587 Market street, opposito the Metropolitan market. *

PHOTOGRAPHY.

THE PICTURES TAKEN IN THIS CITY ARE FAR auperior to those taken in the east and Europe. We account for this simply from our atmosphere, which is lighter and clearer than any other. And this is why so many arriving here have noticed how much better pictures look here than at home. The BEST GALLERY to seek out is one which has the most light, and with few high buildings surrounding it. The New York, on Third street, below Jessie, has more light than any other in the city, and their pictures give more satisfaction, and are far cheaper than those from Montgomery street galleries. *

BILLIARD TABLES.

JACOB STRAHLE IS DETERMINED TO FURNISH Billiard Tables cheaper, and on more reasonable terms than any other establishment on the Pacific coast, having secured repeated premiums for finish and durability of work, as well as for his latest styles of cushions. This shows conclusively that his tables are superior to any manufactured in the city. His manufactory is at 537 Sacramento street, near What Cheer House. *
